OUR OPINION

The New Mayor

In a few days the management of our municipality will fall into new hands. The leader of an orchestra has been selected to direct the affairs of government. He is without experience in such matters, but few men are when chosen by the people for the first time for high office. We have no training school for Mayors. Usually we select either a business man or a lawyer, but neither commerce nor the legal profession equips a man for the duties of Chief Executive of a big city. At first blush it strikes one as absurd to entrust a fiddler with the important office, but if he be honest and intelligent he should be as capable of rendering good service as the average shop-keeper or fee chaser. The man in trade seldom makes a good public servant because he is too easily reached. Even though he would like to act conscientiously he is often deterred by influences brought to bear through his commercial connections. Lawyers are not desirable officials because their training prompts them to regard almost every office as a means to a selfish end. Mr. Eugene Schmitz may give us a very good administration. He is believed to be an honest man, and he is undoubtedly anxious to make a good record. He hasn't any trade that he is afraid of losing, and he is unpracticed in the art of deception. The only element to which he is under obligations is that composed of the laboring classes, not the professional laboring men, but the men that work and sweat and draw meagre wages. They are not in the ranks of the crafty politicians, and they are not going to overwhelm him with demands for jobs. As their representative he is in a less unhappy position than the public official who has trained with the practical politicians and who is called upon to reward the workers. He may heed the reasonable requests of his constituents without revolutionizing the city government. Yet he may cut quite as wide a swath and receive nothing but the plaudits of the people. He may, for instance, require the Board of Public Works to do something beside drawing salaries, and he may compel those unblushing members of the civil service commission to retire from office until there is something for them to do.

What the Ritualists Want

Some weeks ago, when we discussed certain inconsistencies of the Anglican church and declared that there was a tendency to drift toward Catholicism, we were taken to task by an Anglican clergyman, who intimated that our assertions were absurd. He failed, however, to convince us of error. Now comes the Bishop of London with a proposition that appears to sustain all that was asserted in these columns. His proposition is for a Round Table Conference on the subject of Confession and Absolution, which shall meet under his auspices. The question to be discussed is the advisability of reviving the Catholic practice of confession. It is now customary in the Anglican church to have occasional recourse to the counsel and advice of the clergy, but the Ritualists are anxious for an habitual practice of Confession and Absolution as provided for by Catholic authority, binding on all consciences, considered as the essential preliminary to becoming a communicant, and to be known as the "Sacrament of Penance." Surely, when the Bishop of London proposes a conference of churchmen on such a subject, it is reasonable to infer that there is a tendency to drift toward Rome. And if the Bishop of London's proposed conference were not sufficient to warrant the inference, perhaps the address of Mr. Justice Phillimore before the Holborn Branch of the English Church Union is. The title of that address was "Fifty Years of Progress in 'Catholicising' the English Church." He denounced the system of national education as godless and declared that it was manufactured by the State and imposed on the schools.

The Two Wizards

Young Marconi is not quite so chimerical in his ideas as Tesla, but he is equally sanguine. Both scientists are exceedingly enthusiastic and boastful of their achievements, and it would be difficult to determine which is the more fanciful dreamer. Marconi is evidently the more practical of the two, for he has succeeded in demonstrating that wireless telegraphy is possible, but Tesla has yet to convince sane people of the feasibility of communicating with the inhabitants of Mars. Each has the faculty, however, of making people believe in him, and though Tesla's dreams are of a most unsubstantial nature, there are many that think him capable of accomplishing great and seemingly impossible feats. The faculty is a valuable one, for it enables the scientist to secure capital with which to experiment. So far Marconi has succeeded only in signaling across the Atlantic, and yet it is assumed in some quarters that his wireless system is a commercial success, and that it would be a waste of money to lay a cable across the Pacific. Marconi has stated that he has not the slightest doubt of his ability to perfect his system for commercial purposes, and thereby affect an enormous cheapening of communication. He estimates that, with his wireless system in operation, the cost of a message across the Atlantic would be reduced from twenty-five cents to a cent a word. That is a statement that kindles the imagination and incidentally startles the stockholders of the big cable companies, but Signor Marconi has a great many obstacles to overcome before he can demonstrate that the maintenance of submarine cables is an unnecessary expense. Let us hope that he will do so before Tesla has established a speaking acquaintanceship with the chaps in Mars.

Cultivate the Garden

The Chronicle makes a plea in its editorial column for the return of the old-time garden, and refers regretfully to the time, not so far in the past, when the humblest householder had his little posy bed, and the people of San Francisco took pride in their roses, pinks and fuchsias. It is to be hoped that some attention will be given to the subject, and that, instead of filling the little space in front of dwellings of the humbler sort with a solid bed of concrete, or asphalt pavement, people will be once more induced to give some thought and attention to the raising of flowers. California is a favored land, and the natives and old-time residents, who are accustomed to the bounty of prodigal nature, have little idea of their good fortune. Elsewhere, where snow covers the ground for months in the winter, or the blazing heat of the middle of the year makes floriculture an arduous and uncertain occupation, people take pride in raising even a few house plants, and many of the commoner sorts of geraniums, calla lilies, etc., which we regard as little more than weeds, are carefully potted and taken indoors, where they are covered from frost, and often times a fire kept at night lest they should suffer damage. Our roses, fuchsias, pinks, carnations and heliotropes, which we permit to take care of themselves, if they once take root, are looked upon as rare. Any one who is willing to give a few minutes a day to weeding and watering can have flowers in profusion, and even the poorest need not lack, for slips and seeds can be had for the asking. Indeed, one need not ask, for there is always waste enough from even a moderate sized garden to supply the nuclei for a dozen more. There is nothing which will do more toward the disguising of the shabbiness of an old house than a bright patch of garden, and even if ground is not available, there is still the possibility of the window garden. What is needed is the spirit of love for flowers—not the conventional love which manifests itself in the wearing of great clusters of expensive blossoms, to be thrown aside as soon as they show signs of drooping, but a genuine love for the things that grow up from the soil and contribute to the beauties of nature.

Divorce Becoming Less Easy

To any one who devotes a casual glance to the outcome of divorce proceedings it is becoming evident that the golden age is fast coming to an end for lovely woman. If men be brave and bold enough to make a stand for their rights, they may find themselves entitled to some recognition. One fair lady, who applied for legal separation on the ground of her husband's intemperance, was opposed by her spouse on the ground that she was well aware of his habits before the marriage. She admitted the knowledge, but put in the plea that she had hoped to reform him, and was denied her petition, the judge informing her that she could not call on the court to rectify her wilful errors. Another, who alleged cruelty as her grievance, made complaint that her husband wanted her to leave some entertainment and return home, and that when she refused he took her by the arm and forced her to accompany him. She, too, was denied a separation, the court stating that when a woman marries a man she tacitly consents to live with him in such manner as his means and station warrant, and that if she does not yield obedience to his reasonable wishes he is justified in using some degree of force to insure her compliance. Another judge has expressed the opinion that a woman suffers no hardship in earning her own support, and that there is as much reason in demanding that she shall work for the man as that he shall work for her. In another instance alimony was denied on the ground that where there are no children to be supported and no community property there is no reason why a man should be burdened with the support of an ex-wife. There has also been a number of cases in which women, having placed their infant children on the stage, or found paying employment for themselves, have made out cases of technical desertion or failure to provide, in order to detach themselves from domestic duties, but somehow, they have been less fortunate than formerly, and judges have decided against them. Altogether, the business of getting married for fun and wanting to throw away the toy when it has ceased to be amusing has had some serious setbacks of late, and if judges continue to apply common sense in their decisions and pay less heed to the stage griefs of applicants, we shall be in a fair way to see the industry of getting rid of husbands regulating itself with some regard to decency without the need for special legislation, or the assistance of the clergy.

Talkative Miles

It appears to be the impression in Washington political circles that Lieutenant-General Miles is hot on the trail of the Presidency, and that that is why he talks so much. General Miles may be ambitious and may hope to become the Chief Magistrate of this country, but we cannot understand why that should be argued from the circumstance of his volubility. There is nothing so fatal to a man's political chances as talk. It has killed more politicians and shelved more statesmen than any other vice. Being a strategist, General Miles, if he is preparing for a great political coup, should keep his mouth closed. The rebuke he received the other day at the hand of the Secretary of War was a serious one, and it would never have been administered if Miles had not talked too much. It did not serve to elevate him in the estimation of conservative people, whose ideal soldier is the man of poise and few words. Miles exhibited bad judgment at the close of the war by telling the public about the embalmed beef served to the soldiers. He should have reported the matter to his superior officers when it first came to his attention, but he preferred to make a grand-stand play in the newspapers after all the evil had been done. The court that was convened to investigate the scandal reached conclusions that warranted President McKinley in doing more than rebuking Miles, but he displayed his usual forbearance. General Miles has proved himself a gallant soldier, and has earned the gratitude of the nation, but in peace he is less picturesque than in war.

The Saunterer

The King's Amour

According to the press despatches of Sunday last there is friction in the royal household of Great Britain and Mrs. George Keppel is the cause. This is the same Mrs. George Keppel over whom there was much ado in Newport a few months ago. The members of America's first families fell over one another in their anxiety to pay homage to the King's favorite. Yet this woman has been the theme of unsavory gossip in the clubs of London for many months. Could there be any stronger evidence of the slavish obsequiousness of American smart society than that furnished by the Newporters in their attitude toward the woman of whom it is pretty generally understood that she has taken the place of the bold and mercenary Langtry in the affections of the amourous monarch.

He's Becoming Reckless

The King's affections may have become merely platonic since the days of his princely intrigues, but as the First Gentleman of Europe he should be more solicitous of the reputation of the fair one who receives so much of his attentions. To carry on in such a manner as to excite the jealousy of the Queen is very bad form. A king's facilities for intrigue are so great that he should be able to conduct an amour without taking the world into his confidence. But from what a correspondent wrote me a short time ago I should judge that he was getting reckless in his old age. Less than three weeks ago he became the godfather of Mrs. Keppel's nephew, and the child was christened Edward. He rode to the ceremony with Mrs. Keppel and Tom Lipton in a private carriage. Perhaps it was his connection with that affair that aroused the indignation of Queen Alexandra.

The Hopkins Tangle

The other side of the story of the Hopkins domestic tangle presents the young husband in a light somewhat different from that in which I exhibited him two weeks ago. From an item in one of the dailies I was led to believe that Hopkins had declined to defray the expense of bringing his child into the world. The fact is that he never questioned the bill. The services for which he refused to pay were performed against his wishes. He objected to a certain operation which is a feature of a religious ceremony, but his wife insisted on having it performed. It appears that Hopkins has had a somewhat disastrous experience. His wife is several years his senior, and he married her when he was only twenty-three. They lived together only three weeks, and the experience came high.

His Costly Experience

After their separation Hopkins paid for his wife's support until she brought suit for divorce. Then by order of court he allowed her four hundred dollars to defray expenses. Thereupon she moved to dismiss her case, but her husband objected, contending that she should be compelled to return the expense money if she had no intention of getting a divorce. That matter is now under advisement. Hopkins has agreed to pay his wife five thousand dollars cash for a divorce, six hundred more for counsel fees and to pay liberally for the support of his child until the latter is twenty-one. So he isn't such a bad fellow, after all.

The Perkins Boom

The Perkins senatorial boom is being handled in a most amusing fashion. It is being inflated with hot air at such a great rate that it is in danger of breaking loose from its moorings. Just now the Senator is working a new dodge—new for him, but an old one among politicians. He is playing the part of faire l'homme d'importance, and he is doing it with considerable aplomb. Only the other day the story was published that Perkins was being talked of as the possible successor to Secretary Long. Roosevelt said he hadn't thought of him, and Perkins was quoted as saying he was glad because he should hate to have to take a Cabinet job. Imagine pressure having to be used to induce George C. to enter the Cabinet!

A Little Political Fiction

In the same story it was stated that if Perkins got out of the senatorial fight political affairs would be greatly complicated, because then there would be a great scramble for his toga. In other words, Perkins' friends would like to create the impression that he has no opposition and that he is not likely to have any; that he has such a cinch on the job that nobody would undertake to give him a battle. I should like to know the brand of embalmed beef this Californian Caesar has been feeding on. Or, perhaps, the more valuable information would be as to the kind of dope he has been smoking.

An Expert Trimmer

The fact is that Perkins was never mentioned for a Cabinet position outside of his own campaign committee. As Blinker Murphy would say, he isn't eligible even to a seat in Jim O'Brien's cabinet. He would be eligible to the secretaryship of the navy only in the event of our substituting sailing vessels for our present style of warships, for Senator Perkins is one of the best trimmers I know of. To attest his efficiency in that respect one need only recall the story of his appointment by Markham, or of his recent change of front in the Lynch fight, or of his exhibition of invertebracy when called upon to assist in putting down certain abuses in the Presidio hospital. I am of the opinion that Mr. Perkins has not such an easy fight on his hands as his friends hope to make people believe.

Lucky Captain Harris

Captain Floyd W. Harris of the Fourth cavalry, well known as the polo-playing and cotillion-leading adjutant of the Presidio during the Spanish-American war, recently left his command at Walla Walla, having been detailed as military attache to the American legation in Vienna. Captain Harris is the officer who was so fortunate as to secure the hand and fortune of Elenor Truax of the State of Washington, whose father was a director of the O. R. and N. railroad. Some months ago I told of her romantic engagement to a wealthy Coeur d'Alene miner, which was broken by the latter's death, but not before he had made a will bequeathing her about a quarter of a million. The captain and his bride may be expected to cut a wide swath in the diplomatic colony of Vienna.

Misplaced Chivalry

They have a chutes in Los Angeles, and an amusing incident occurred there a short time ago. A well known San Diego lawyer and politician, the nephew of a Riverside lawyer, was visiting the chutes when, to his horror, a lady fell in the lakelet into which the boats make their thrilling plunges. Without a moment's hesitation the San Diego Adonis plunged to her rescue, but, alas! the water was scarcely knee-deep and he stuck head first in the mud. A more embarrassing fate for a chivalrous gentleman could scarcely be imagined. The gentleman from San Diego was extricated from the slime of the pond and amid the laughter of the spectators he hastened, by the most secluded by-ways, to his lodgings.

The Pinkertons as Reformers

Bill and Bob Pinkerton, the premier detectives, object to certain statements made by me some weeks ago. They have written me a letter emphatically denying that they are millionaires. So emphatically do they deny it that one might imagine that next to being called a crook there is nothing quite so bad as to be stigmatized as a millionaire. They also deny that they ever supplied a crook with money with which to buy tools to blow up a safe. Of course, I had no intention of charging them with complicity in safe robberies. But it appears that the Pinkertons have spent a little time and money in reforming criminals. They are proud of their record as reformers. "We have on more than one occasion," they write, "had returned convicts come to us and profess a desire to lead an honest life if they could find anything to do. We have on many occasions aided them in getting honest employment, and in some instances have aided them financially, but only with a view of encouraging them to go into some legitimate business, and a number of noted professional thieves have, through our efforts been induced to lead better lives, and we could name a dozen of them who are today prosperous business men. But as for paying for protection in any shape or manner, that is something we have never done and never will do."

An Editor Complimented

Spontaneous recognition of the good qualities of the head of a department in a newspaper office by the men in the department is not of ordinary occurrence. Consequently a little incident which took place in the Chronicle local rooms, Christmas eve, deserves more than passing notice. When City Editor Simpson returned from his dinner, he found a small package on his desk. The package contained a Christmas present, but what affected Simpson more than the contents was the inscription on the accompanying card:

"To the squarest City Editor in the business, from his staff."

That was a very handsome and unusual compliment, for the relations existing between City Editors of the big dailies and their staffs are seldom of the most harmonious character.

Benny's Gift

Benny Benjamin, of Attic fame, who is a member of the Chronicle staff, is an ardent friend of the little ones, and he made Christmas presents to all his juvenile friends, and among them was little Miss Waldorf, aged five years, daughter of a Chronicle reporter. Benny dotes on literature, and he bought the child a book. It wasn't a fairy tale or a picture book, for Benny scorns such trash. It was a handsomely bound copy of "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The child's father suggested that it would be desirable to seal the book up until his daughter gets old enough to enjoy it.

That Unfortunate Blunder

Editor Town Talk: I read with a good deal of interest your comments last week on the outrageous action of Hale Brothers in causing the arrest of a respectable woman on suspicion of having stolen a purse, and then apologizing when they found that they had made a big mistake. You have sized it up right. It is an outrage for store-keepers to subject their patrons to the risk of being falsely accused by cheap special officers, men who could not get a position in the regular department, owing to their record. I am told that the firm objected at first to having the apology published in the local newspapers, fearing that it might hurt their business. Do they consider their business of greater importance than the reputation of a woman? A Subscriber.

Hale Brothers have learned a lesson that they will not soon forget. The lady from Woodland was unfortunate, but her experience may serve to inspire the employes of the firm with caution. Her misfortune may protect other women from the embarrassment of a ride in the patrol wagon. Perhaps she was fortunate in not being prosecuted for a man who is quick to charge a woman with petty larceny would not be slow in swearing in support of the accusation.

Presented to the President

The William M. Bunkers are quartered at the Normandie hotel in Washington. Mr. Bunker went to Washington as the representative of the Chamber of Commerce, and he is already in touch with the "powers that be." The Bunkers were presented to President Roosevelt by Senator Perkins, and the President fell to chatting about their recent trip through Siberia. He wanted to know all about the conditions in that country, and in a burst of boyish exuberance exclaimed, "By Jove, Mr. Bunker, I envy you that Siberian trip." My Washington correspondent writes me that the President and Senate are destined to lock horns in as pretty an official battle as was ever seen. Roosevelt is to be President or know the reason why and the members of the millionaires' club are already squirming over the prospect of losing weight.

She is Devoted to Her Art

More than one club man desires to entertain Minnie Seligman, but the Grand Opera House's high-priced star refuses to be entertained. She says it takes all her time studying, and as she has to get up a new part every week and rehearse with the stock company, no doubt she is right. The three Eds—Edgar Peixotto, Edgar Mizner and Edward Greenway—have been very devoted as far as sending flowers and bonbons to Miss Seligman, and that is the extent of the attentions she is willing to accept. The club men were heartbroken, I hear, at their failure to have Miss Seligman as their guest of honor at a large supper they purposed giving last week in the Bohemian club's red room. But the star, who is as beautiful and youthful in appearance as when she last appeared here, when she was the bride of young Bob Cutting, insists upon her iron-clad rule of all work and no play. The only invitation she would consider was one to view Benny Benjamin's "Attic" on New Year's eve.

Mrs. Young's Generosity

There is a hot time in the old church in Garden Grove. Preacher Barton is sore nettled and the majority of the congregation are calling down the wrath of God on one of their fellow church members. The church is of the Baptist persuasion—hardshell and plenty of damnation—and until a few days ago was of a beautiful dark color inside. The interior of the edifice had been carefully stained the natural tint of the redwood and was a source of extreme pride to the worshipers. Garden Grove is near Santa Ana, which is near Los Angeles. One of the richest of the members of the church is Mrs. Belle Young. She is generous and the pastor often owed his turkey dinner to her sending the flower of her gobbling flock to the parsonage. When Christmas drew near Mrs. Young scratched her head to think of some unique gift which would earn her the thanks of the congregation, and perhaps entitle her to a closer communion with the Maker of all things..

The Terrible Shock

One day after she had decided on her Christmas present to the Garden Grove church, the janitor was paralyzed on opening the doors for his weekly dusting, to find the whole interior a snowy white. Where before all had been red, now walls and ceiling, communion rail, organ loft and pulpit, were painted a dead white. The janitor—a religious darkey—at first fell on his knees and cried aloud: "Lawd, de days ob miracles am shoh come back!" But when he saw that the paint was still wet and found a brush or two around, his faith gave way to earthly amazement, for he reasoned that angel artists would not leave their tools behind them. Pastor Barton was summoned and shouted in astonishment. Then came trustees and ordinary citizens. Excitement was feverish and all sorts of rumors were soon abroad. Why any one should thus deliberately ruin the handsome church and its harmonious furnishings, none could understand. Then bounced in the pious Mrs. Young and presented the white paint to the preacher. Even the burning things the old prophet said when the boys called him "Baldy" would sound chilly spoken with the anathemas uttered by the good men of Garden Grove.

Wores a Hit in Hawaii

My Hawaiian correspondent writes me that Theodore Wores has made a big hit with his portraits of distinguished Honolulans. He painted Miss Jennie Giffard, one of the beauties of the American set, as a study in red, and it is considered a fine likeness as well as a striking pose and treatment. Dorothy Freethe's portrait and that of Eva Focke are also most successful. Mr. Wores catches the child expression charmingly. "But it is not so much the clever portraits," goes on my correspondent, "that have conduced to Mr. Wores' popularity, as his studio teas. These teas, on Friday afternoons, are delightful and 'tis a pity they must be discontinued. For the artist is going on to Samoa as soon as he finishes Governor Dole's portrait. In Samoa he will visit Mr. Kunst who occupies the house that was so long the abode of Robert Louis Stevenson."

Why Joe Didn't Shine

Joe Tobin played polo when he was in Honolulu, but he did not distinguish himself before the native players. The reason of this was not that the tropical climate rendered him inert, but because of his poor mount. There are no polo ponies worth the name in the Islands, and not one that compares with the poorest in the Blingum stables. If Mr. Tobin had been mounted on Charlie Dunphy's pony he would have shown the Hawaiians that his reputation as a crack polo player was not one of wind. For Joe certainly knows how to ride.

Dramatic Scenes in Court

The subjects of "will" breaking and "dramatic" evidence were being discussed during a recess in the Max Kershaw case, the other day. Chief Smasher Kowalsky having recounted a number of his experiences, a quiet little visiting German counselor, Von Bergen by name, cited the following little incident as being quite out of the ordinary in his experience: A Vienna millionaire manufacturer died leaving all his great wealth to his widow, a young woman not over thirty. Suit was brought for a share of the estate by a beautiful girl who claimed that the millionaire was the father of her son, a child eight years old. By the time the case came to trial she was in very destitute circumstances and made a plea for at least enough to support her child, as her health was gone. She had practically no evidence to support her cause and her case appeared hopeless. Her lawyer was in a quandary but the emergency supplied him with the winning idea. He called for the child. Both women regarded the lad intently: the mother with moist eyes because she saw her hope of providing for him slipping away and the childless widow to read his lineaments to see if he told the story of his birth. The little fellow won his cause, for the childless woman suddenly exclaimed: "It is enough. The boy is the image of my poor husband. I will maintain him till he grows up and then he shall have as much of his money as the law provides."

She Will Never Return

The Baroness von Schroeder has written friends here that she will never return to San Francisco. She has handsome apartments in Paris, and her sons are in school in Germany. She is greatly opposed to her husband's doing anything more in the famous and unsavory libel suit. Indeed she was opposed to it from the beginning. Her husband's relatives are married to members of the highest nobility, and the Baroness is a personage of considerable importance abroad.

The Obstinate Juror

Two amusing incidents grew out of the trial of young Dunphy, who emptied two revolvers into the carcass of his sister's seducer. One of the jurors had the reputation among the court officials of being a very hard-hearted individual. It was understood that he generally voted for conviction, and after the jury was impaneled, the court officials declared that the defendant was "up against it," and that with the hard-hearted individual in the jury-box the defendant could not be acquitted. John Barrett, the attorney for the defense, heard the rumors, and he was very much worried. Throughout the trial he devoted most of his attention to the obstinate man with the indurated heart, but he soon discovered that he could not interest the fellow. Whenever the attorney introduced a bit of evidence favorable to his client he looked at the juror and found the latter gazing at the ceiling in an abstracted manner, or leaning on his cane with closed eyes as though in slumber. As the trial progressed, Attorney Barrett grew more and more indignant, and when he argued the case and found the obstinate juror nodding somnolently he became hopeless. Finally the case was submitted to the jury. Just as the jurors entered the jury-room the obstinate chap turned to the bailiff and asked for a copy of the court's charge. Then Barrett was certain that his client was doomed, for of course the court had instructed the jury that to kill a human being is murder unless in self-defense. But the jury acquitted the defendant, and as they were leaving the court-room the hopeless case stepped up to the anxious mother of the defendant and said: "You needn't to have worried about me; I had just such a case in my own family."

The Hungry Chap

When the jury entered the jury-room, it was afterwards learned, a ballot was taken and eleven men voted for acquittal. There was only one vote for conviction. It was then near the noon hour, and, as is customary, the jury was escorted by the bailiff to a restaurant in the neighborhood and fed at the expense of the city. During their absence the news leaked out about the ballot, and all the anxious people in the court-room were certain that the vote for conviction was cast by the man whose reputation as a pro-prosecution juror was so well established. But they were wrong. It was cast by a man who was for acquittal from the start, but who explained to his fellow-jurors that he wasn't going to lose a chance to eat at the expense of the city by agreeing to a verdict just before the clock struck twelve. The circumstance of a man's life, hanging in the balance, didn't bother the hungry juror.

Coulter Brinker's Widow

Word comes to me that the widow of Coulter Brinker has buried her grief, and this month will take unto herself a second husband in the person of E. E. Morgan, a Stanford student now traveling for the Abbey Salt company in the East. Mrs. Brinker is an actress of some reputation and has been playing leads in a stock company in Newark, N. J. Her late husband was very well known here when he was leading man at the Grand Opera House at the time Maude Edna Hall was leading lady. He was a matinee god and was popular about town because of his cordial ways and his liberality. His death was tragic. He fell out of the window of a New York hotel, and I understand his widow is suing the railroad that owns the hotel for damages.

A New Kind of Patient

A wealthy old bachelor of Oakland went to the Fabiola hospital one day recently and said he desired a mustard foot bath. When the head physician asked him what was the matter, he answered:

"I've got a bad cold. I live in a boarding house and I can never get any hot water when I want it. So I came here. Give me a mustard foot bath."

He got his foot bath, stayed in bed two days and went back to his boarding house cured of his cold and happy. Miss Braddon made one of her characters say that even a millionaire was not happy, because he couldn't hire some one to get up for him in the morning. And even a rich old bachelor doesn't find hot foot baths within reach—at least in Oakland.

She Will Never Marry

A New York correspondent writes me that Miss Violet Gratz-Brown is as lovely as ever, and shows no desire to relinquish her maidenhood. Miss Gratz-Brown, it will be remembered, is the young woman who was to have married Fred Somers, onetime co-proprietor with Frank Pixley of the Argonaut, and later owner of Current Literature. Mr. Somers' untimely death prevented the marriage. Miss Gratz-Brown is a beauty of the Lillian Russell type and was much younger than her fiance. When Somers died it was found that he had left his promised bride all his fortune which was considerable. I believe his relatives contested the will, but that it finally stood as the testator desired. But that Miss Gratz-Brown really loved Mr. Somers is proved by the fact that in spite of her youth and attractiveness she has resolved never to marry.

Why Platt is Thankful

Mr. Samuel J. Platt is evidently somewhat of an optimist. In the following circular which I received by mail the other day he expresses himself in a manner suggestive of a very cheerful view-point:

1. Thankful the world is growing better; many preachers with tact are receiving four, five, and six thousand dollars a year.
2. Thankful some Filipinos are left; our soldiers need exercise.
3. Thankful that though the Lord made the sea on which all men may sail, Congress, by subsidies, can control it for a few.
4. Thankful that though through law came monopoly and corporate trusts, the fool people don't know that law can take away what it gives.
5. Thankful that while the independent tradesman is increasingly not, your kid may some day be a Schwab.
6. Thankful we had no money interest in South Africa. It's the other fellow's dead.
7. Thankful the people will soon be paying for irrigation; timber land is getting scarce.
8. Thankful the Chinese don't vote.

He was a Contract Doctor

Dr. Kierstadt, the young physician and rumored fiance of Miss McBean, is not thirty years of age but he has the rank of first lieutenant in the army. He is of excellent family and his father is a retired naval officer. Yet he is not regarded as a very great catch. He went out to Manila a few years ago as a contract doctor and did so well that he was taken into the army. Some time ago it was thought that Sam Boardman and Miss McBean would make a match, but Samuel transferred his attentions to a daughter of Sidney Smith of San Rafael.

A Child with a Chilly Past

John Shirley Porter is a Sunday writer for the Fresno Republican, and handles a caustic typewriter. John is really a pretty girl with a sweet, feminine name and dainty frocks, but she likes to hear the yokels talk of "that cuss Porter who writes them items in the Republican fit to make you cry," and so she carefully disguises her sex. The other day, John signed a pathetic paragraph about a beautiful child of three years whom she saw on Fresno's streets with little socks on, and an expanse of pink flesh between their tops and the tiny trousers. She berated the cruel father and mother who sent their baby into the cold air of Fresno without long stockings, and predicted the early death of the victim. The next day the rich father of the boy replied in verse, and two stanzas of his poem are annexed:

'Twas in the North, wise Porter,
'Mid Klondike's ice and snow
That darling lad first saw the light—
But this you didn't know—
And, in the glacier's torrent,
He bathed, at age of three—
Not years, but months, my learned friend—
That boy belongs to-me!

So when you chew your pencil,
In search of topics, lost,
Forget it, dear friend Porter,
My lad won't feel the frost.
Your sex, miss—I surmise it,
And hope the day you'll see
When heaven sends you such a boy
As that belongs to me.

—HIS DAD.

The next move of that happy pair, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Macfarlane, will be a trip around the world with the bride's sister, Mrs. Dutton, and the latter's husband.

London's Latest Craze

"Crystal gazing" is the latest craze to fasten its grip on London society, according to Fletcher Tyndall, the well-known promoter, just back from a visit to the world's metropolis. Andrew Lang, the critic, started the fad by an article on the occult mysteries of crystals. He recommended that every one should possess a crystal ball and sit down before it with the hope of seeing uncanny things. According to his advice it is best to sit with your back to the light. Place the ball at a proper focus with a piece of dark cloth for a background. Try to exclude reflections. You may, however, concentrate your mind on any particular thing you please. Stare fixedly at the ball for five minutes, and then you will see—wonders. Some see them and some don't, but you won't know whether you're among the lucky elect till you've tried. Mr. Lang claims that he has known people to see things in the crystal that were actually happening many miles away. More wonderful still, he has known people gazing into separate crystals at the same moment at different places to see the same picture in all its details. But to tell of all the wonders he claims to have seen would be a hard tax on your credulity. However, his article has started a great discussion among people interested in psychical research. So enthusiastically has society taken up the picture-gazing part of the matter that the supply of crystal balls is far short of the demand and numbers of "crystal gazing parties" have had to be postponed in consequence.

A Committee on Grammar Wanted

At the Knickerbocker Dame entertainment given by the ladies of the California club, Mrs. Alex Sharon was the star, and she filled the role very well. At the close of the little play she walked out on the stage and said, "The ladies would like to know if we looked natural." There were cries in the affirmative. Then she said, "The ladies would like to know if we acted natural." Laboring under the misapprehension that Mrs. Sharon was formerly a school teacher I was surprised at the cultured club-woman's unfamiliarity with her adverbs. But I have since learned that she was not a school teacher. It was Mrs. Will Sharon of Oakland who was the Nevada school teacher. Mrs. Alex Sharon's early occupation was not mental. Somebody has suggested that Mrs. White should appoint a committee for reforming the grammar of the members of the club.

Why She is Exclusive

The clever skit of the cultured clubwomen on the aristocratic backbone of the Eastern women's clubs did not appeal with equal force to all the members of the clubs invited to its premier production. The topic of Blood is not one that is always welcome at local women's club meetings, for reasons that are very apparent. For instance, in one of the prominent clubs there is an active member whose attitude is always characterized by cold hauteur. The exhalation of frigidity from her person is something very trying to the more cordial members of the club, who have nevertheless excused her demeanor on the ground that she was "so aristocratic." One of these was in a California street car the other day with a friend, when the frapped clubwoman entered. She bestowed but a chilly nod on her fellow member.

"Why, I know that woman who just bowed to you," said the friend.

"Do you? That is Mrs. ——, one of the richest and most exclusive women in our club."

The friend laughed.

"That possibly explains why she didn't recognize me," she said, "for when I last saw her, twenty years ago, she was the——s' cook."

Why the Postleys are here

The Stirling Postleys of New York are in town. They are the guests of Mrs. Postley's mother, Mrs. Cook, at Belvedere. They are looking for a house and intend making San Francisco their home. Mr. Postley's sister recently came out in New York, and Mrs. Postley received at the tea. So it was expected she would winter there. But they prefer San Francisco, for though they are prominent and wealthy they are not exactly the real thing in the big swim. Young Postley has a yacht and a tremendous allowance from his mother who was Margaret Stirling, heiress to a big slice of the Singer millions. His father was in the navy, I believe, and for years was commodore of the New York Yatcht club. Life here should be very agreeable for the Postleys. Mrs. Postley is a very pretty woman. She is quite disgusted with New York, I am told, and declares it to be a mercenary place where men consider themselves so precious that they ask what a girl's dot is to be as if they were European nobles.

Miss Dillon's Jaunt

Miss Dillon is en route to Japan and she feels that she and Miss Cosgrave are very unconventional because they have only a maid and no chaperon with them. They really believe themselves quite daring, and imagine that there is a touch of abandon in their conduct. But according to Geraldine Bonner, in the East any woman of twenty-five is permitted to go without a chaperon. That is the age Miss Dillon frankly confesses to, and as Miss Cosgrave is some years her senior one should imagine that they were not doing anything very risky. Miss Dillon is not satisfied with her campaign in society, for in spite of her great wealth it has not been an unqualified success. She has not had the vogue she was entitled to because of her loyalty to useless friends and poor relations. To get on socially one must be like the Boston woman of whom Prince Poniatowski wrote in his ill-fated but brilliant Parisian magazine. She cut her own brother because she had too long a list of acquaintances and felt she must draw the line somewhere.

Their Funny Ways

Besides being too loyal to people who could not boost her socially, Miss Dillon has been held back somewhat by weight. She carries too much avoirdupois. Society girls are such funny, faddy creatures and they have peculiar prejudices and queer notions. The Burlingame and Hopkins set would often accept Miss Dillon's invitations to receive with her, and then as their intimates came in they would remark, "Did you ever see such a funny crowd? I don't know them at all; do you? I am sure I don't see why I am receiving. There is no one here I ever saw before" So after all I won't blame Miss Dillon if she does decide to live abroad as I have heard she intends doing after returning from her present trip. She is an interesting, cultured young woman, and she has plenty of money with which to enjoy herself in any set. And by the way I have heard that Fred Greenwood has sworn never to marry while Miss Dillon remains single, and she says she is going to be an old maid. So there you are.

Advertisers to Meet

A general convention of advertisers is to be held at Delmonico's in New York on the twenty-ninth and thirtieth instane under the auspices of the Association of American Advertisers. This association includes in its membership about sixty of the largest advertisers in the country. As some of the most important questions in the field of advertising are to be discussed it would be well if some of our local interests were represented. There is no subject of which the business men of San Francisco are more densely ignorant than that of advertising. By reason of that ignorance some of them waste many thousands of dollars every year in injudicious advertising and by putting their advertising business in the hands of incompetent agents, and others fail to increase their business through lack of advertising. There was a time when the consumers of the Pacific coast had to buy from San Francisco houses but that time has passed. It is a well known fact that San Francisco is the greatest field for the fake advertising schemer in the country, and the poorest for the legitimate advertising medium.

Under Suspicion

The friends of one of our most charming and popular society belles are much perturbed over the encouragement which she appears to be giving to an automobile agent from the East. It is not because they are in favor of patronizing home industries but for the reason that they feel that the young man has not come to the city properly accredited. Deception has been practiced by so many strangers from the East that the newcomer who talks of his New York social standing and of the clubs to which he belongs, in a breezy sort of a way, becomes at once the object of suspicion. The automobile agent may be all right, but he is being "whispered" at the clubs by men who think that if he had been properly branded they would know something about him. Meanwhile, he is suspected of being a pretender.

Her Palm Roused Cheiro

What wonderful secret has Cheiro, the palmist, discovered in Mamie Josselyn's hand? My London correspondent writes me that he became simply fascinated with her from the moment he looked at her palm. He gave her a very entertaining reading, but all the while he seemed to be laboring under some strong excitement. After she left with her companions, he abruptly rushed from his rooms and spent the remainder of the day trying to discover all he could about her. Later he sought an introduction to her through influential parties. He sent her loads of rare and beautiful flowers and no glorious prima donna ever had a more devoted or determined follower. So intense are his attentions that it has attracted the lively interest of the friends of both parties. Opinion is divided whether it is the fortune in "the hand" or in "the girl" that is attracting him. At present the odds are in favor of the "the hand," because Cheiro is not given to this kind of thing. In private life he is known as Count d'Hambourg, and is extremely punctilious in the matter of the strict proprieties. Until he glanced into the palm of Miss Josselyn he was generally regarded as a neophyte whom no allurements could entice from his devotions at the shrine of the occult. Now it is just the other way, and he seems willing to worship forevermore before the pretty palm that swept him off his feet. Society will remember that Mamie and Florence Josselyn left here about a year ago "to do" Europe. They are being chaperoned by an old governess of theirs, an Englishwoman, and are having a most enjoyable time.

They Watch Mr. Eugene Murphy

Dame Rumor has had her lorgnette fastened on the Hopkins households ever since Dan Cupid began to cut up his pranks there. The anxious old lady insists that he will never quit his comfortable quarters till all the girls are married off. Georgie having been satisfactorily disposed of, she has suddenly waked up to the fact that Cousin Frances has been loitering near the orange-blossom groves while the marriage bells have been merrily ringing for her cousins. Is Eugene Murphy the happy man? That is the question that is bothering her. There have been whisperings and they all come through Cupid's court. At one time everybody thought that Bobby Eyre was surely the real Prince Charming, but he went to sleep long since in that fairy tale of the past. And now—well, Dame Rumor has her lorgnettes focused on Eugene Murphy and she expects to make some sort of authentic announcement shortly. Frances Hopkins has a married sister, Mrs. Warren Clark. Mr. Clark is "in sugar" with Spreckels and is said to be quite wealthy.

Which Made the Better Match?

Anent the approaching McNear-Hopkins nuptials the tea tabbies are in the throes of a mighty discussion. Is Georgie making a better match than her sisters made when they married the Taylor boys? Of course, the girls themselves don't care a fig for such idle vaporing but to the inveterate tea tabby it is a question of mighty moment, fraught with details of prime consequence. They attack it very much after the fashion of Brother Bottom and his fellows settling the momentous episodes in the love-lorn end of the much lamented Pyramus and Thisbe. The plum of contention between the arguing tabbies seems to be: Is wealth or blood the better to capture in a match nowadays? The tabbies of family blood maintain with fine insistence that the Hopkins-Taylors made a much better match than did Georgie because the Taylor boys have better social blood. Their stubborn opponents deny this conclusion on the score that the slight difference in the sacred blue is more than compensated for in the golden stream young McNear will inherit. Those who are tired of hearing the wrangle declare nobody will know the difference in another generation. "But it's got to be settled in this generation," call back the tabbies, "we're making ancestry."

"Gorgeriferous" Dances Promised

The McNears are going to give Georgie Hopkins a captivating dinner dance next Thursday evening. Great preparations are being made for it in the Van Ness avenue home of the Newhalls which they have leased for the season. All this of course is in honor of her approaching nuptials with Fred McNear. All sorts of plans are being raked up in search of original ideas for the german. It will be danced after midnight and some "gorgeriferous" effects are promised. So mysterious are the whisperings over it that people are wondering if "it's this time" that the long-heralded attempt will be made to imitate the Eastern custom and embellish the dance with royally rich favors. What a deal of comment it would create if all the girls left the gay scene wearing favors of chiffon hats adorned with splendid plumes, and all the men walked out with gold-headed canes. That's the way the host tried to delight his guests at a notable dance in the East and the favors distributed didn't rank high in expense among those of the season, either. San Francisco, as I remember, has always been shy of coquetting with expense in these affairs. Last season some of our wealthiest and most promising buds were launched in the swim on tea, not always cold tea or bad tea, but plain tea just the same.

Launched on Plain Tea

I recall the debuts at the Hopkins and the Scott residences—not to mention lesser lights. I cannot think the Hopkins' considered the expense but in other cases there is very little doubt but what the fashion was adopted because it was an easy and inexpensive way of discharging obligations to three or four hundred guests in the afternoon. The suggestion to dine that number on champagne and truffles would make the paterfamilias in many an ornate avenue home throw up his mercenary hands in dismay. But a change in all this seems impending in our finest homes. From the great tidal wave of Prosperity sweeping over the land comes a ripple that seems to be lifting society out of its old "keep-down-the-expense" methods. The recent completion of a number of magnificent Pacific heights mansions has raised and enlarged the scope of opportunities for more lavish entertainments. We've got to live up to the magnificence of these new homes. In consonance with this idea I hear that a number of plans are already being discussed to launch this season's buds on something far more substantial than tea; in fact, it will be nearer the "field of the cloth and gold" idea than anything we have hitherto approached. Further indications of the awakening of Society to entertainments on a more elaborate scale are the balls planned by the Huntingtons and De Youngs. There are others on the tapis and the dawn of the most magnificent social season we have ever had seems at hand.

An Hawaiian Poet of Passion

From the South Seas comes a cry of poesy. P. Maurice McMahon of Hawaii has sent across the ocean a volume of verse, wrapped in the loin cloth of the native, and warm with the passion of the tropics. In a hundred and fifteen pages P. Maurice sings sonorously of sea and sky, of plumy palm, of daring dance and dusky damsel, of nights of love under the stars and days of dalliance by maidens' knees. P. Maurice is an Irishman transplanted from the land of shillalahs to the sensuous clime of the Paradise of the Pacific, and the atmosphere of the Islands of Idleness has gone to his head. For instance, P. Maurice says in the second stanza of a poem dedicated to "A Picture of a Taupo Maiden"—

> Clad in the garments nature has wove for you
> Quaint and luxurious and brief is your dress;
> So lovely you are, by the gods, I would rove for you
> Millions of miles your brown bosom to press!

To His Talofa

Evidently P. Maurice is not of the missionary ilk. He ends the same poem as follows:

> Talofa, Talofa! oh, smile to my yearning,
> Drain the wild rapture that flows in my veins!
> Nurse me and succor me, ease the mad burning
> That surges within me: Love's bliss-laden pains.
> Then I will blend to you, finding no end to you,
> Clinging as mortal but clings in a kiss;
> Sweetly I'll sigh to you, fondly I'll die to you,
> Drowned in Love's whirls of delirious bliss.

Surely, Ella Wheeler in her maddest moments could not give P. Maurice much of a start. He has that same fond fancy for bussing which Ella croons about in many verses. In an eight-stanza poem entitled "A Kiss," the Irish Kanaka winds up an impassioned tale of a chaste salute which made his ears buzz, by lifting:

> 'Twas Love that sang! then let us kiss again,
> And hear his witching song, and taste his honeyed blisses;
> So sweet it is, I'd fain forever rest
> My lips on yours, vibrating to your kisses,
> And dreamily drift on Love's impassioned sea
> From life to life throughout eternity.

I will leave P. Maurice with the disclosure that he is a bachelor, handsome, and yearning for real love. In Hawaii he is thought the salt of the earth, for he seeks to carry out the biblical mandate: "Increase and multiply."

The Beveridge Girls

A correspondent writes me from London that little Ray Beveridge, the pretty blacksmith of the World's Fair in Chicago is making a reputation among the ultra-bohemians of the great metropolis But it is not for her gold horse-shoes that she is winning renown but for her skill as a hostess. She gives little dinners that are voted delightful by the happy guests invited to partake of them. Ray keeps house for her mother and sister. They have a cosy house in Wilton street, Belgravia square, and Kuhne has a studio. The sisters are much at home in London, and have many friends there. Baroness von Wrede is anxious to return to her husband in Johannesburg but on account of the war and the unsettled state of the country, she has been persuaded to remain with her daughters in London.

Why Barnes was Opposed

General Barnes is receiving congratulations from all quarters over the report of his being selected to fill the position of Minister to Japan. Now the story is being told that Senator Perkins opposed the appointment of Barnes, his motive being to throw the job to some other State, so as to leave an opening for his own appointment to the Secretaryship of the Navy. But General Barnes had a warm friend in Secretary Hay, and the latter worked assiduously for the appointment of the Californian attorney.

Deserving of Reward

It is about time for Barnes to receive substantial recognition from his party. He has been a vigorous campaigner ever since he came to this city, and he has received very little reward. Until recently Barnes never bothered about political office. There was a time when he was one of the leading and most active practitioners at the local bar. It was a lucrative practice, too, for Barnes was a high-priced attorney, but ever since the famous Sharon case in which he figured as the principal attorney for the defendant, clients have been constantly growing scarcer in his office.

Worrying a University President

My Seattle correspondent writes me that President J. Pierpont Graves of the Washington State university, is up against journalistic unpopularity. Since assuming control of the university four or five years ago he has essayed some measure of control of the Pacific Wave, a periodical published by the students, and he has incurred the enmity of the editors. Several of them have since entered the professional newspaper field in Washington, and they have never lost an opportunity to smash President Graves. As a consequence some pretty tough stories about the university have been told. One of the latest put into circulation was about a student who was permitted to slowly starve himself to death while pursuing his studies. It was a fake and was turned down by the papers of Washington, but it was put on the wires and published all over the country.

Jim Hill's Blunder

My correspondent also writes that political agitators throughout the State of Washington are carrying on a noisy campaign against the proposition to merge the Northern Pacific and Great Northern railroads under the organization of the Northern Securities company. Efforts were made to have an extra session of the Legislature called for the purpose of legislating against the consolidation, but the last special session was so disastrous that the people won't stand for another. The fight is led by Governor Van Sant of Minnesota, who was opposed by James J. Hill in the last campaign. That was one of Hill's few political mistakes. He usually stands in with both candidates and contributes liberally to every campaign sack in sight. But he thought Van Sant was a sure loser.

Mrs. Emil Steinegger, who is with her husband in Vienna, was among those attending the Thanksgiving reception at United States Minister McCormick's. It was a large and very smart affair. Many Americans from New York and elsewhere were among the guests.

Where Rudeness Abounds

A correspondent writes me apropos the McCutcheon vaudeville, to ask why the McCutcheons do not throw open their hospitable mansion oftener; also, to inform me that Mrs. McCutcheon is a charming hostess, highly cultured and intellectual, and that she could easily gather around her the "best" of San Francisco society. And my correspondent adds that Mrs. McCutcheon is of the opinion that many of our society people are lacking in refinement, and that she is intolerant of rudeness and quick to resent it. If that be so perhaps no answer to the introductory query is required. No one intolerant of rudeness cares to mingle with rude people, and undoubtedly there is much room for improvement in the manners of our smart folks. If you are not in the swim and you doubt it, take a seat in earshot of a theatre party composed of local patricians.

Let the Coon Song be Tabu

Mayor-elect Schmitz has the power to work one reform which would win him the admiration of thousands. It is as a musician and not as head of a great municipality, however, that he may earn public gratitude. Let him persuade his harmonious brethren to declare war on the obscene coon song. The Chicago Federation of Musicians has addressed a call to their fellows throughout the United States, asking them to put down this sort of music, which they term "immoral, obscene, degrading and unworthy of production." Now let Mayor Schmitz follow the lead of the Windy City purists, and put down ragtime rot. Many of these coon ditties discuss the doings or sayings of fictional cocottes and the wretches who live luxuriously on their earnings. "Take Your Clothes and Go!" "I Ain't Seen No Messenger Boy," "My Honolulu Lady," and all the miserable syncopated silliness which records the joys and woes of wenches, coons and babies, should be left for the ears of those whose sphere is that of the heroes and heroines of the rhymed indecency. I crave no reputation for prudery but I cannot forbear saying something on this subject. The theatre-going public has too long stood the flood of puerile and immodest drivel which, set to ragtime, passed as a witty characterization of the negro race.

Got His Turkey from the Yankees

They were telling of Christmas experiences at the club the other evening when Col. Jones, who served on General Gordon's staff in the Civil war recounted the following unique experience. It happened at the time when Grant was hammering Lee's lines before Petersburg. The Silent General was working forward for the final clinch. About Christmas time the outposts of both armies were so close that the men could talk across the trenches and toss things to each other. The Federals had all they wanted to eat and used to twit the besieged Confederates on the chilly, hungry Christmas they would have. "The day before Christmas," narrated the Colonel, "one of the non-commissioned Union officers spiked a turkey on a bayonet and triumphantly swayed it before our eyes. 'What'll you give for it, you hungry Rebs?' he said. 'If you're a gentleman,' I shouted back, 'you'll send over a bunch of them with your compliments. This isn't the season to tantalize a hungry man with such sights.' Down went the turkey and the boys in blue fell to palavering. Pretty soon the non-com. called back, 'Come over and get the turkey.' 'You won't shoot?' 'Nope.' 'Nor make me prisoner?' 'Nope.' So I slipped over into the Yankee lines and came back loaded with three big turkeys. You bet the boys cheered me more than if I'd captured their siege guns. Next day we had a great Christmas dinner in the staff tent. Gordon heard the story of my crossing the lines and friends intimated to me that I'd got myself into a serious fix. But it turned out all right. Gordon never said a word—he got part of a turkey. And let me add, that wasn't the kind of a Christmas out there in the trenches to make a fuss over the way you got your turkey—so long as you got it."

Clubs That Entertain

The Press club treats its womenkind better than does any other men's club in the city. The Bohemian lets the ladies in every first Wednesday, but that is only for a stroll around its handsome rooms. On stated occasions, few and far between, it gives formal receptions but these are nothing like the delightful ladies' jinks the club gave in its old Pine street rooms in years agone. Time was when the Olympic club gave ladies' receptions, when dancing was the order of events in the big gymnasium in the old Alcazar building. Later, the club gave ladies' nights of a somewhat more interesting order than those it now gives. But the Press club's ladies' jinks are the right thing to please the women. That on Monday night was attended by the usual large and happy crowd. The decorations of the jinks room were picturesque and appropriate to the season, the refreshments were of the light kind that women like and the music was inspiring. Before the dancing began there was a program of many good numbers.

Songs That Never Grow Old

If George King adds any number of new songs to his repertory his audience will still prefer "The Stein on the Table." He sang two others at the Press jinks, but his hearers insisted on "The Stein" and called him back for a stanza of that. William MacDonald had to give a verse of "The Armorer's Song" before the audience would let him go, and as for William Brown, he might have been singing still if encores count for anything. They tried to make Billy Hynes sing his laughing song, which is the best thing he does, but he would not. I begin to think the average audience likes old songs better than new ones, after all. There was another William on the jinks program who made a hit, though not with his music. This was Billy Barnes, who sired the affair. He wielded a little hammer early in the evening, but did not find it necessary and discarded it later on. The four Williams were the biggest stars of the program.

The Important Social Editor

The society editor is no longer a person of minor importance in the daily newspaper office. There was a time when the editors and reporters looked upon "social slush," as they contemptuously denominated items of social news, as a necessary evil. It was supposed to interest only those whose names were mentioned, and the more names that could be crowded into an item the more valuable it was believed to be. The doings of society of all grades were exploited in those days, and there was a time in the long ago when one daily devoted two pages each week to Tar-Flat surprise parties. That was when Joe Irwin and Walter Cooke were rival society editors. But of late each of the local dailies seeks to feature the gossip and the doings of the smart set. The movements and the social affairs of the common herd are written up by any old reporter, but the affairs of the rich and haughty are discussed by a high-priced society editor who is in touch with the elite, and who poses as an authority on swagger functions. In the evening newspaper field society news is ranked with the most important happenings of the day, and there is now such a thing as scoops on engagements and stork visitations. The Bulletin was the first to feature the gossip of the smart set, and for a while Madame La Bavarde had a cinch on swell social news. People wondered how she got it all and they guessed that she was one of the inside push who was after a little pin money. The Post proceeded to sneer, and the funniest man on the staff started to josh Bavarde chat in a burlesque department. But Madame La Bavarde pursued the even tenor of her way until Editor Hume began to realize that news of fashionable events was of interest to people who are not in the swim, and then he started a rival column. Now the evening dailies are doing their level best to keep Mary Riley of Tehama street informed about the social dissipations of Miss De Vere of Pacific avenue.

The Judge Plays the Ponies

Some three weeks ago the local papers noticed the arrival of Judge Gear, of Honolulu, and commented on the fact that the judge was on his way to Washington to do a little politics relating to a proposed judgeship in the islands. The fact of the matter is that Judge Gear is here for a little rest and recreation, which he finds at the Oakland race track. The judge takes a great interest in the ponies, and it is said that he uses his judicial mind to such an extent on the races that he will not have to draw on his salary for the expenses of his vacation.

A Harrison Needed in Minneapolis

Frank L. Thresher, formerly of San Francisco, has been located in Minneapolis for some time past. He writes to his Bohemian club friends that though he doesn't like the northern climate very well, Minneapolis is a great town for sports. He says if they had William Greer Harrison there they would have a great athletic club, just as they have a great football team and an equally great baseball nine. They have yacht clubs and ice-yacht clubs that have a national reputation as winners, also gun, hunting and shooting clubs. Mr. Thresher was noted while here for his love of outdoor sports and he carries his enthusiasm wherever he goes.

The Author of "The Sky Pilot"

The Winnipeg people who have migrated to San Francisco read with interest of the vogue that has been attained all over the United States, as well as on the other side of the line, by "Ralph Connor," otherwise the Rev. C. W. Gordon, author of "The Sky Pilot," "Black Rock" and the latest of these popular tales of Canada, "The Man from Glengarry." There was talk some time since of dramatizing two of these books into one play to be called "The Sky Pilot of Black Rock," but I have heard nothing of its accomplishment. A Winnipeg resident at present visiting San Francisco tells me that the Reverend Gordon of St. Stephen's Presbyterian church is probably the best liked preacher in the Manitoba metropolis. He is a small man, like Barrie's "Little Minister," and his line is not the loud, oratorical one that generally makes a preacher effective. He is very fond of society and is punctilious in the matter of dress. He always wears evening dress when the occasion calls for it and is at all times the pink of propriety in social etiquette. He is a third cousin of Lord Aberdeen and when the latter traveled over Canada with Lady Aberdeen Mr. Gordon accompanied them. He is a married man, his wife having been one of the belles of Winnipeg, Miss Helen King, whose father was the principal of the Manitoba College.

Something about "Glengarry"

The scene of Ralph Connor's latest novel is laid in Glengarry which was the author's birthplace. His father was like himself a minister of the Presbyterian persuasion. He came to Canada as a missionary. The Glengarry revival was a real happening and is the motif of the novel. There is something about Mr. Gordon's books that appeals to every reader, very much as do the works of Ian Maclaren and Barrie. While they have a good deal of religion in them it is not make-believe piety. He describes cowboys, saloon men, cattle punchers and gamblers in language more terse but quite as picturesque as that of Bret Harte. And he is an authority on sports, too. His description of a baseball match in "The Sky Pilot" is good enough to have been the work of a baseball reporter on a daily newspaper.

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

The Dog in the Manger

No doubt the dog finally tired of barking and let the cow eat its hay—but perhaps by that time the poor beast had no use for the hay.

It is easy enough to give up the world for a woman. For a woman like Margaret Horton more than one man would throw his career and his hope of salvation to the winds.

And Margaret Horton thought it easy as valsing to give up the world—her world, the polite world, the world of society—for Douglas Land. "All sham," she denominated the circle in which she had reigned a queen for several seasons, "but love is true. A life of love is one where falsity never enters."

So Douglas Land deserted his wife and with Margaret Horton vanished from the monde where both had been prominent figures. Their flitting was a nine days' wonder, their action gave the tabbies and the newspapers something to talk about, and then something else chased the unconventional lovers from the sensational pinnacle they occupied. Except for a rumor that Mrs. Land would sue for a divorce, Douglas Land was a forgotten name.

However, Mrs. Land did not seek the divorce court. She continued to hold her place in society, went about, entertained and was entertained as before. Her beautiful face was always serene, her manner as unconcerned as if she were not a deserted wife. Nobody dared ask her what her plans were. Not her dearest friend could summon courage to mention Margaret or Douglas' name within her hearing.

Stories were brought by returned tourists of the recreant husband and his companion. They were on the continent, traveling from one place to another. Then a letter came from a dowager who had seen them in Brittany.

"They have a little cottage and are cooing like two turtle doves. Margaret is absurdly happy—she nourishes expectations. I do hope Isabel will hurry about that divorce, so as to make matters right."

The news came to Mrs. Land's ears, but she certainly made haste very slowly if she intended to assist her husband to "make matters right."

Perhaps Isabel Land lacked the maternal instinct. She had never had any children herself.

* * * * * * * * * *

The world for love! Ah, 'twas a rosy-hued existence that Margaret led after she had taken the momentous step that cut her off from her kind. Conscience was in a trance, if it cherished any germ of life whatever. Douglas blinded her eyes to anything but himself. After the splendid round of Europe they settled down in Brittany, the spot where have been lived so many beautiful love stories.

And then something happened that changed the rapturous current into something a trifle less evenly fervent. It has occurred to others, but then Margaret did not take it as a matter of course. She had said it was easy to give up the world for Douglas Land, and she had meant it, but that was before those inner promptings came. Margaret wanted a name for her child.

"Don't you think Isabel is slow about getting her divorce?"

The question startled Douglas. The subject had never been brought up before. Margaret had seemed to live entirely in the present.

"I don't know," he said, "it takes time to manage those things."

But her query gave him food for thought, and the outcome was a letter to his lawyer at home. In time the answer came:

"I have heard of no divorce proceedings on Mrs. Land's part. She seems inclined to let the matter rest as it is."

Douglas did not tell Margaret. But it was as if a little crack had been made in the glass of their happiness. He caught Margaret gazing at him furtively, sometimes, and if she caught his look she would turn away quickly. There was a pensive sadness in her gaze that irritated him, he could not explain why.

He wrote to a mutual friend of Isabel and himself, suggesting that he probe the former on her intentions with regard to a divorce. It was a long time before the reply came. It was well Margaret did not see it.

"I think there is no doubt that Isabel still loves you," wrote the friend; "at any rate she says nothing that one could construe otherwise. As for a divorce, she hasn't a thought of it."

It was now but a few months to the time when the expectations were to be realized. Margaret broached the old subject herself.

"Can't you get free somehow? 'Tis cruel, wicked of her to hold us in suspense like this."

"But we never spoke of such an ending—never thought of it once."

"Oh, I know," she returned bitterly, "it was all love then—and I do love you, dear, but then we had not thought of this."

She turned from him that he might not detect the tears in her eyes.

Douglas would have done anything for her then, his beautiful darling. He humbled his pride and wrote to Isabel. "Cable answer," was the last reminder.

Isabel Land read again the letter she had just received from her husband. It was a manly letter, in which he made a plea for the woman who had given all for his love. He took the blame upon himself, and asked Isabel if she would give him his liberty and the right for Margaret to bear his name. "Answer quickly, before it is too late," he wrote.

Isabel turned the letter over in her hands, as its contents were being turned over in her mind. The past revolved before her mental vision. She had never been a loving wife. Cold, distant and unsympathetic were the recording adjectives that she saw. But she had loved Douglas, nevertheless, and she hated Margaret as she thought of Douglas' love for her.

"You never cared for me," he said in his letter, "never once. It can cause you no loss to sever the tie that was never really bound."

She thought and thought. Should she be magnanimous? Her hand grasped the pen that was to write the answering message. Douglas could never be hers. Her own coldness had estranged him forever. Margaret's glorious face came before her; she pictured it alight with mother-love, and Douglas by her side. Oh, surely she must make the sacrifice. But—there was a curious smile on her face as she rang for her maid and despatched the message.

* * * * * * * * * *

In reply to Margaret's eager glance—for Douglas had not been strong enough to keep from her the news that he hoped to arrange matters—he shook his head. No answer yet had come. But Margaret was as happy as a child. The two walked together daily in the sweet-scented fields and again their love had no alloy.

A peasant brought the message when Douglas was out. Margaret hastily tore it open. She kissed it before opening it.

"My child's salvation," she murmured.

Then she read it. There were two words: "In December."

When Douglas came back, he found Margaret holding in her hand the cable message. There was a stony look on her face. When she saw him, she held out the paper. He read it and then threw his hat in the air like a boy just told of a coming holiday.

"Why, it will be all right, darling," he said, "we'll be married in the new year."

But she did not answer his smile with its duplicate.

"Why wait till December?" she questioned, "when—did you tell her it would be in September? It's only July now."

As his face fell, her own brightened. She threw her arms around his neck.

"Never mind, love!" she cried, "as I sowed, so I reap. And I don't regret it, only—"

Then she checked herself, and said instead: "But why doesn't she get the divorce right away? Can you fancy?"

Probably Douglas knew. —The Moralist.

II.

A LARKISH LEGEND

Once on a time, a simple little wight
Conceived the funny notion he could write.
And, worst of all, chose verse to bear his thought,
So wooed the Muses and their favor sought.
The wight's conceit so tickled all the Nine
They laughed until the tears bedimmed their shine,
And as with one accord at once conspired
To give the wight the glory he desired.

So happ'ed it, when they answered his request
For transport to th' high Olympian crest,
They told him (hiding laughter on the side,)
That they with winged steeds were ill supplied;
Each Pegasus was busy day and night
Transporting other bardlings into light.
"But stay!" said they, "if you must travel now
Why not attempt the journey on a cow?"

"A cow?" The simple wight was illy pleased:
Yet even this forlorn hope gladly seized;
"Bring on your cow!" he cried, "or wild or tame
I'll mount the beast, for I'm a-thirst for Fame!"
The cow was brought; but first 'twas dipped into
A good, fast dye, of brilliant purple hue,
(The Sacred Nine, exulting in their lark, Thinking that purple would cause most remark,)
And thus resplendent, on the bovine's back
The wight set forth along the upper track.

The Sacred Nine then went their sacred ways
Sure that the wight and cow ere many days
They'd see returning. "For," they reasoned, "how Could he ascend Olympus on a cow?
A winged steed can barely make the height;
How may a purple bovine with a wight?"
But time sped by, and neither wight nor cow
Was seen returning. Then upon the brow
Of broad Olympus, (where they'd gone one day
To transact business in the usual way.)
The sacred Nine were much amazed to see
The simple wight, with half a laurel tree,
Thumbing with all his strength upon his lyre
But breaking now and then his song's sweet fire
To spurn with fretful foot and words profane
The purple cow bound to him with a chain!

The Sacred Nine no sooner had espied
This curious sight than to the minstrel's side
They quickly flew. "And so you're here!" cried they;
"Let us congratulate you, if we may.
Considering the humble way you came
You're most deserving, sir, of all your fame!
But tell us,"—and they sniggered—"tell us how
It happens that you're fettered to the cow?"
At this interrogation rose the wight
And eastward flung his lyre with all his might,
And after he'd relieved his wrathful soul
By fearful language, managed to control
His voice enough to tell them how it came
They found him thus upon the heights of Fame.
"You see," he said, "when we came into sight
We gave the gods a spasm of delight.

" 'Ho! Ho!' they cried, 'a bard upon a cow!
Come nymphs and naiads, deck his noble brow,
And give him welcome, all ye sons of light—
Here's something new for our enraptured height;'
So I dismounted; but when I was fain
To send the cow back to its lower plain
A mighty roar went up from that vast throng;
'Nay! Nay!' they cried, 'to do that would be wrong!
But for the cow you'd ne'er have reached us, bard:
The cow must stay—'tis but her just reward.'
And so, you see, they bound us with a chain
For fear, no doubt, that I would try again
To send her back. And so the cow and I Live on together here. * * Ah, well, I try
To be content, for I've my lyre, you see.
Which cheers me always; and my laurel tree—"
He turned around, then shouted, black of brow:
"She's ate my laurels up! O curse the cow!"

STAGE

Why the Orpheum Pays

I often used to wonder why so many people say they prefer to go to the Orpheum to any other theatre but I do not wonder any more. It is not because you are always sure of seeing something good there—I have seen many a poor show at the Orpheum. It is because mental relaxation is more easily obtained by sitting through a vaudeville program than by spending the same amount of time at a play. When the ear is tired of listening to a coon shouter, or the brain weary of trying to grasp the point of a playlet's dialogue or a monologist's jokes, there is always the audience to fall back upon. And an Orpheum audience is always interesting. There are so many faces, and no two ever bear the same expression. This week the bill is a good one. Picolo's liliputians are a mine of entertainment. They are dear little midgets and as clever as if their bodies matched their brains. Their wrestling match is as good as any Olympic athletes could do. Joe Welch, the monologue man, needs to be heard more than once to be appreciated. His Yiddish stories are worthy of preservation. Ritter's trained dogs go through several clever acts. Elizabeth Murray is as popular as she was on her last visit. The Aglos are remarkable equilibrists. The Orpheum road show is indeed a talented aggregation.

Through the Week

Minnie Seligman's portrayal of Clorinda Wildairs in "The Lady of Quality," a character so utterly different from Carmen, is quite as strong in its particular lines as was the latter. She is best perhaps in the later scenes, where Clorinda's womanly attributes shine forth so clearly.

"There never was a minute when Auntie wasn't in it." and there never is a minute when the audience is not laughing at the amusing situations in "Charley's Aunt." Its laugh-raising power has not dimmed in the years that have passed since its birth.

"Little Red Riding Hood" with its changed specialties is still a money-maker at the Tivoli.

Georgie Cooper is making herself a great favorite with the Central audiences just as she did at the Alcazar. She reminds one very much of Ada Deaves and I should not be surprised if the former were to follow closely in the successful footsteps of the latter. Their talent is much on the same lines.

An Undutiful Son

Count Leo Tolstoi, son of the great fakir Tolstoi, recently made his debut as a playwright at the New Theatre, St. Petersburg, in a piece which he called "Nights of Folly." It is said to have been incoherent and poorly constructed, and to show no promise. Count Leo had the bad taste to go out of his way to cast ridicule on his father, and this lack of filial respect prejudiced his audience. In another respect his experience duplicated that of the elder count, who once read portions of one of his works to some of the peasantry, but while the tears coursed down his checks at the pathos of his passages, the auditors found only cause for boisterous laughter. Similarly, in "Nights of Folly," the situations were so poorly presented that what the author intended to cause tears produced a laugh.

An Energetic London Manager

A San Francisco friend of Charles Wyndham says that he is positive there is no truth in the rumor that the Piccadilly manager is to resign in favor of a younger director and divide his time between New York and London. "He will die in harness, I am sure," said Wyndham's local friend, "for he could not live happily out of it." Wyndham has many acquaintances in San Francisco, particularly in the Bohemian club, of which he is an honorary member. He is one of the most successful managers in the world, yet he started with a capital of only three hundred dollars. During his twenty-three years in charge of the Criterion theatre but two productions were failures. Those were plays by Henry Arthur Jones. The mediaeval play by Parker, "The Jest," was a partial failure, but Wyndham believed in it and revived it later at his new playhouse. Only twice in his life has he underestimated a play's value. Four times did he refuse "The Candidate," the adaptation of "Le Depute de Bombignac," before acceptance, and he saw nothing in "The Tyranny of Tears" to warrant production under his management. Wyndham admires Shakespeare but feels that it doesn't do to produce his plays, because he fears to jeopardize the fortune he has made.

Not a Good Market

A correspondent in one of the local weeklies recently made the observation that Chicago and San Francisco were the best show towns for off-color farces. Now I don't know anything about Chicago in this respect but evidently this correspondent has never visited a San Francisco playhouse when an off-color farce was under discussion. As a rule the bedstead dramatic production has died here not because of police interference but because the public wouldn't go. "The Girl from Maxim's" died a lingering death, about a sixteenth of a house being present at the funeral. It is true "The Turtle" drew on its opening night but after that was a frost. "In Paradise" drew because though it was risque it was clever, and Mary Van Buren's delicate handling of the principal role redeemed it from vulgarity. "Never Again" was another Frenchy farce that bordered on the risque but was not coarse because it was so clever. But I have seen any number of broad farces put on at the local theatres and killed by the heavy frosts that struck them after their premiers. San Francisco audiences are tolerant. They will receive with friendliness many mediocre shows because perhaps there are one or two good features in them that call for applause. But they object to vulgarity. A vaudeville performer was once hissed off the stage because she ventured a coarse witticism. No, decidedly that correspondent erred in dubbing San Francisco a good show town for the off-color farce.

Attractions Next Week

It is many years since "Henry VIII" was presented here, and its revival by Madame Modjeska and Henry James is consequently rendered the more interesting. The great Shakespearean drama has almost the effect of a novelty. It is a play that calls for elaborate mounting and gorgeous scenery. Modjeska plays Katherine; James, Wolsey. It is a mistake of Wagenhals and Kemper's press agent in saying that "upwards of a decade" has passed since the drama was produced in this country, for it was given here only a few years ago with Frederick Warde as Wolsey. "Henry VIII" will be next week's bill at the Columbia. Supporting Modjeska and James are many fine actors, and a chorus of trained voices is a feature, as is the instrumental music, written and arranged by Carl Busch, conductor of the Kansas City Philharmonic orchestra.

For the last week of Minnie Seligman's engagement at the Grand Opera House, beginning next Monday evening, a double bill will be presented. Carrano's dramatization of "Cavalleria Rusticana" will be given, the play in which Alexander Salvini scored one of the greatest successes of his career. The whole action of the play is short, terrific and fascinating. Preceding this play W. S. Gilbert's version of "Comedy and Tragedy" will be produced, the play in which Mary Anderson was so successful and which was considered one of the best drawing cards in her repertory. With two such strong attractions the last week of Miss Seligman's engagement shoud be her largest.

"Red Riding Hood" at the Tivoli, now in its third week, will be seen again next week and possibly for another. New songs are to be added and the dances changed and brightened. Hartman has a new joke or two to provoke the risibles of the audience, and will sing his songs, "I'm Tired," and "When Mister Shakespeare Comes to Town." Following the holiday piece, comes a regal production of Frank Daniels' "The Ameer," which was seen here some months ago. Among the favorites who will appear in the new production are Anna Lichter, the soprano so popular at this house, Frances Graham, the contralto, and Harold Gordon, a new tenor, late of the Southwell St. Louis company.

There is no play containing more heart-reaching qualities than "The Wife," which will be the Alcazar's bill next week. David Belasco wrote "The Wife," in collaboration with H. C. De Mille, and none of his later plays have struck this from the list of popular dramas. Juliet Crosby will be Mrs. Ives, a role she has played before. George Osbourne returns to the company, in the part of Silas Truman. Mr. Alsop will be the senator and Mr. Rutherford the private secretary. The full strength of the company will be in the cast.

Leonard Grover's old favorite, "Lost in New York," will be the Central's bill next week. Georgie Cooper has the role of the tank heroine, who performs a great swimming feat.

One of the most interesting personages in vaudeville is Jacques Inaudi, who will make his first appearance in this city at the Orpheum tomorrow. His act is principally "figure juggling," impossible to describe, as it is a repition of extraordinary mathematical calculations. Eddie Girard, of "Natural Gas" fame, and Jessie Gardner, a vivacious comedienne, will present their farcical hit, "The Soubrette and the Cop." The three Westons, musical artists of acknowledged reputation, will present a pleasing act, and Alf. Holt, a whistling and mimetic comedian, will make his first appearance here. Mr. and Mrs. Gardner Crane, who scored such a success in "A Happy Pair," will return for one week with a new playette, and Jessie Dale, the girl baritone, will also reappear. —The Playgoer.

The King of Yap

David O'Keeffe, the King of Yap in the Caroline islands is dead. When O'Keeffe landed at Yap thirty years ago the cannibal natives thought him a demigod on account of his white skin and made him their King.—Daily paper.

The King of Yap is dead, the chief
His people thought too good for beef
Adored him in their native Yap
Nor served him corned scrap by scrap;
Saltpetre did not save O'Keeffe.

That mystic isle he held in feof,
A little god in Yap's belief;
An Irish god may fill a gap
Be King of Yap.

Yap's kingdom is not cribbed by reef
Of Southern seas. 'Tis common grief
That everywhere tongues yap and scrap;
Its kingdom covers all the map;
On Babel's tower the first O'Keeffe
Was King of Yap.

AUTOLYCUS.

The Ancestor's Club

Scene, audience chamber of the Very Exclusive and Recherche Women's Ancestors club, during a discussion over the advisability of admitting certain ladies to membership.

The President: I move that we blackball Mrs. Newly Borne without question. It is well known that her grandfather, though he fought in the War, was in private life only a grocery clerk. There is such a thing as drawing the line, you know.

The Secretary: What about Mrs. Millioned Dull?

The Vice-President: She is eminently correct—why, she has seven millions and one of the loveliest houses in town. She will give four large card-parties this season.

The Secretary: But she has no ancestors.

The President: Surely she had a father, and he had a father?

The Secretary: Yes, but they were both scavengers. She inherited their money, went abroad and has now returned to try and wedge into society through us. I certainly will resign if Mrs. Dull comes in.

The Vice-President: And I, if she is blackballed.

The Treasurer: Seven millions!

The Directors: Four card parties!

The Secretary: I'll surely resign (puts on her wrap and hat, and goes out).

The Directors: Who's she to be so particular?

The Treasurer: She was a girl in a store before her marriage, a nobody.

The President: But her breed is unquestionable. She has two bona fide Revolutionary ancestors.

The Treasurer: But she hasn't a nickel!

The Directors: And such pride—it is sickening.

The President: Well, what shall we do about Mrs. Dull? I fear we can't get over the father and grandfather. She's impossible!

The Vice-President: Very well, I must then resign. Mrs. Dull is my most intimate friend.

The Directors: Seven millions!

The Treasurer: I move Mrs. Dull be admitted.

The President: And our Secretary—Miss Abigail Brinckerhoff Van Rensslaer Van Houten Washington Brown?

The Directors: Let her go.

The President: But her name gave such a tone to our little club.

The Treasurer: But Mrs. Dull's money will help us out when we get stuck.

The President: Well, do as you please.

The Vice-President: Thank you, ladies. (Goes out with a smile.)

The Directors: I wonder how much she got for standing sponsor to Mrs. Dull? —The Stenographer.

Red Room Reveries

"Yes," said the first ghost, looking out from his frame, "times have changed since we formed that little club down town." A huge sigh shook the canvas.

"You're right," said the second ghost, "and I'm sort of glad I shuffled off before the old place turned into a society salon."

The big umbrella laughed so that every red lantern rattled on its skeleton.

"Bohemia is not what it used to be." (The voice came from the armor in the corner.)

"Too many woman," growled the owl.

"Yes, and I don't like it. As soon as you let the petticoats in, that spirit of freedom flies—and without liberty what's the good of a club?"

"Women bosh!" spoke up a gay red devil in one of the pictures, "it's money that's spoiled it all. Why, ever since they let in the moneyed men the place has been metamorphosed into a Chamber of Commerce. Where we used to smile down at a host of men dining simply but enjoying themselves like boys, now that umbrella frequently covers a lot of women in low gowns and diamonds, and men in swallow tails and wide white shirt fronts. Decorations costing thousands of dollars cover the table and gallons of champagne are swallowed. It's money talking."

"But if it weren't for the moneyed element, the club would die," suggested the sleek looking original of one of the portraits

"Die your grandmother!" sneered the red devil, "better dead than as it is now. Why, in a little while there won't be a vestige of the old set left. Where now are those merry spirits that used to gather round the fire in this room, sing songs and crack jokes? Where are they, I say?"

"Frozen out," quoth the man in armor with a cackle.

"Gone home to meditate on what used to be and what is now," sadly observed the owl.

"Shut up! Quick, here comes the supper party," cautioned the umbrella.

In swept two dozen sleek youths and pretty girls in full evening attire, and sat themselves down under the umbrella.

"Oh, I do so love to dine here," said the tall blonde, "it's so deliciously unrestrained and bohemian."

"Yes, Bohemia's a mighty nice place," drawled the boy at her side, "and all our set belongs here, you know. 'Tis quite the proper thing, you understand."

"What is a bohemian?" asked the tall blonde.

"A bohemian," replied the youth, "A bohemian is—well a bohemian is a bohemian or in other words a bohemian is a man with money who knows how to spend it. He may be either a successful plumber or a well fed artist who knows how to truckle to the rich."

A whirring sound startled the diners, and a noise like a sob evoked the exclamation: "What's that?"

"The wind shaking the windows," said a waiter.

But the old owl was flapping his wings in despair and all the ghostly forms on the walls were bathed in sighs.

THE OLD BOHEMIAN.

Josef Hoffman, the great pianist, comes to the Columbia in the latter part of this month and will give two matinee recitals. These will be his first appearances here.

Irene Everett is a widow, her husband, Dave Hayman, having died last week. Will the handsome Irene's widowhood mean her permanent return to the stage she has only occasionally graced since her marriage?

MUSIC

The Synphony Concert

There should be a very large attendance at the second symphony concert under Paul Steindorff's direction. It is dated for next Friday afternoon, January 10th, at a quarter after three o'clock. Now that the holidays are over, society and amusement-seekers in general are able to interest themselves in other matters than those that have held the floor during the past four weeks. I expect to see a big crowd at the Grand Opera House next Friday. The Beethoven symphony, No. 5, in C minor, will be the piece de resistance of the program, but there will be other delightful numbers—the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," a symphonic poem by Saint-Saens, the scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and an overture by Lassen, which is entirely new here. Seats will be on sale Tuesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.

Emil Steinegger in Europe

Emil Steinegger writes that he has just returned to Vienna from a two weeks' trip to Switzerland. He has no intention as yet of coming back to San Francisco, as he has quite a class of pupils in Vienna. Three of these are Leschetitzky's pupils, who are studying harmony with Mr. Steinegger. The latter's time is devoted mostly to the study of composition and it is possible that he may produce an operetta before he returns to America. He expects to take a few months' course under Mascagni, beginning next May. While in Vienna Mr. Steinegger has studied with Leschtitzky, Dr. Karl Mawratil, Baron Murpurgo and Robert Fuchs. Fuchs is acknowledged to be the first teacher of composition in Vienna. He is at the head of the Royal Conservatorium.

Church Music

Musical affairs during the past week have been confined to the churches, with their Christmas services and special music. Concerts have come to a stand-still for the time being, and holiday matters have taken their places. There have been splendid programs in many of the churches, big and little, and across the bay. Elizabeth Westgate, in two of the churches in which she directs the music, has given special music of a high character, with fine talent to assist. In the First Presbyterian church of Alameda the Christmas services were held on the twenty-second with the following choir: Mrs. Chas. Allardyce, Miss Georgie Cope, Mr. Edward Thornton, Mr. Horatio Cogswell; Miss Elizabeth Westgate, organist and director. Samuel Adelstein of this city rendered a lute solo, as well as playing an obligato to the tenor solo. In the Unitarian church, at the vesper service, the program was carried entirely by male voices, those who took part being the Messrs. E. D. Crandall, E. H. McCandlish, Lowell Redfield, and Dr. H. P. Carlton; Miss Westgate, organist and director.

On Christmas dav St. Andrew's Cathedral in Honolulu had an elaborate musical service. It began with a Christmas trio for violin, organ and piano, followed by the carol, "It came upon the midnight air" (Sullivan), solo by Mrs. Tenny. The Te Deum by H. M. Dow was sung by sixteen male voices, the tenor solos being taken by Clifford Kimball. The Jubilate, by G. W. Warren, included a solo by Mrs. C. B. Cooper and a quartet. The anthem from Dr. H. J. Stewart's "The Nativity" was given, Arthur C. Wall singing the tenor recitative and T. C. Davies the bass solo. The harp accompaniment running through the anthem was rendered on the piano by J. Tarn McGrew, in addition to organ accompaniment. Wray Taylor drilled the choir.

Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, whose long illness has kept her from public work of any sort for some weeks past, has so far recovered that her physician has consented to her taking part in musical matters again. The series of recitations recently announced will be given by Mrs. Mansfeldt and Hugo Mansfeldt, with the assistance of prominent local talent, on the dates announced, with programs of more than ordinary interest. Mrs. Mansfeldt's reappearance in public work will be greeted with pleasure by musical circles.

The Saturday club of Sacramento gave its one hundred and seventeenth recital on December 21st, with the usual fine program of which Mrs. Emil Steinmann was the director for this occasion. The following members took part: Mesdames J. A. Moynahan, Egbert Brown, W. C. Collis, Frances Moeller, and W. H. Dunster, Misses Rae Bruning, May Omerod, Kate Winn, Eda Quire, Frances Connelly, Dierssen, Minnie Rowley, Elizabeth Taylor, Helen Sunderland Howe, Mamie C. Barrett, Minnie Cantrell,, and Pearl E. Jost, with the following outside talent: Messrs. Egbert Brown, Edgar Coffman, Jerome C. Carroll, and H. Bradley Smith.

Little Enid Brandt is at work on her next season's repertoire, and is including Beethoven, for whom she has developed a great love, in her list. She is also attending strictly to school studies under private teachers, and takes a portion of every day for hearty, healthy play, like other well-regulated children of her age. Nexe year the question of a tour is to be considered, but for the present she will remain in Sacramento.

Alma Stencel in London

It is not enough that Alma Stencel has set all Berlin by the ears with her wonderful achievements, but London has caught the fever, and on her return to America, a telegram met the young artist at New York, asking her to recross the big pond at once for an important engagement in London. Probably no pianist of her age has ever attained greater heights in so short a time, and her popularity grows with every public performance. Much has been said of the whys and wherefores concerning the rapid development of the young pianiste, some attributing it to an extraordinary talent, but few giving the credit where it really belongs. The truth of the matter is that this same little Alma is wonderfully ambitious and realizing that half the battle lies with herself, applies herself diligently to hard work in the form of unceasing and rgeular practice. It is the best sort of a lesson to young piano students, who, desiring in their hearts to really amount to something, lack the mental stamina to carry out their good intentions and are wearied of well doing where practice is concerned. There is no truer saying than "Practice makes perfect," and the example of it lies in the wonderful accomplishments of Alma Stencel, who, at the age of thirteen enjoys an almost world-wide reputation. It is uncertain in the face of this London engagement when the Stencel party will be able to return to the United States for the contemplated tour here.

"A Constant Reader" takes exceptions to the omission of some of the names of musicians whom she considers more important than those mentioned in the Christmas edition of Town Talk. The "Constant Reader" does not stop to consider probably that, were all the really worthy musicians mentioned, several pages of space would be consumed, even though one did not go at all into detail. The article in question was in the main historical, and the names mentioned in that portion of it devoted to the history of musical matters in early days were those of pioneers in music who have been identified with music in San Francisco ever since there has been such a thing as music in the town. Some of our best musicians are, comparatively speaking, newcomers, Mr. Tolmie, whom the lady mentions in her letter, being just as important as many another, but not so long a resident as some who were mentioned. It is a matter of congratulation that we have so many fine musicians in our midst, but it would take a special edition of some hundred or more pages to speak at length of all those who really deserve mention.

Jean de Reszke, who is one of the wealthiest opera singers in the world, has in his private residence in the rue de la Faisanderie in Paris a private theatre, with a stage, where he can rehearse at his leisure the roles in which he later appears before the admiring public. He has also been heard to declare in a whimsical manner that it will be quite useful for teaching purposes in the event of his voice leaving him, though that unhappy period is not anticipated for some years to come. He is now busily engaged in the preparation of the French version of "Siegfried," which will be produced at the Paris Grand Opera House before long.

For the benefit of some of Town Talk's readers, who are interested and were not long since making inquiries about this very subject, I quote the following from the Courier, which, in turn, has quoted from the New York Sun: "Signor Sonzogno, whose prize of ten thousand dollars, offered for the best opera by an Italian, was won by Mascagni with 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' has now offered a similar prize for the best one-act opera in any language. He offers to produce the successful work at his own expense at Milan on the occasion of the international exhibition in 1904." Here is a chance for some of our California talent to win laurels for his country. Nothing venture, nothing have, and ten thousand dollars are worth trying for.

The musical program at the Olympic club's Christmas day reception included selections by an excellent orchestra, carols by choristers from St. Luke's, songs by Mrs. Blanchard, Donald Graham and Mr. Van Linghem, piano solos by Miss Fullah.

Mrs. Arthur Franklin Bridge, who returned not long since from study with Dr. Curtis in New York, has removed her vocal studio to 2232 Broadway, where she will receive pupils till further notice. —The Music Critic.

NEW METHOD OF TESTING EYESIGHT.

The eye is the most delicate organ in the human body and few understand its mechanism. Every man or woman whose eyes show any signs of failing power should consult an eyesight specialist at once. There is no specialist better than an expert optician. George Mayerle, the German expert, of 1071½ Market street, is recognized as a leading authority on eyesight. His method of testing the eyes has been endorsed by the highest army, navy and government officials, and is locally vouched for by many prominent members of the police department and others. Mr. Mayerle's method of fitting glasses to the subject is simple, but always gives satisfaction. There is something in the Mayerle glasses that particularly commend them to mental workers; they undoubtedly strengthen both eye and brain.

A POPULAR BRAND.

Since Mr. Charles M. Reynolds assumed the management of Hunter Baltimore Rye, the sales of that ever favorite brand have increased to an immense extent. Hunter Rye is the whisky preferred by smart people and is properly termed the American gentleman's drink. Its qualities are unquestionably superior.

LETTERS

Two Volumes of Poetry

It is with mingled feelings that one reads "Turquoise and Iron," Lionel Josephare's new book of poetry. The title is an apt one in more than a single sense, for in the subject matter of the volume there are contrasts fully as striking as that implied in its strange title. Lionel Josephare is undoubtedly a poet. He has passion, imagination, language and an ear for verbal harmony. On the other hand, he lacks restraint and is too frequently crude and commonplace. His verse irritates as often as it charms. True, latter-day art affects to deny the existence of the ideal and even glorifies the ugly, claiming that the main thing is the expression of the artist's personality. I do not care to discuss this phase of the question, but will venture to assert that in poetic art at least the form counts for much. Beauty of imagery, nobility of expression, melody of line are no more than the fit embodiment of any poetic thought worthy of the name. Mr. Josephare's figures of speech are often most unfortunate. Instead of ennobling, embellishing, or clarifying the thought his images too frequently trifle with it, degrade it, or distort it. Thus in "The Winged Heart" he says, "Softly fare thou, bleeding ace," a trivial metaphor suggestive of a game of cards. On the next pages, "The tinctured rose 'gan unfurl its folios." Who can resist the image of a big book? The beautiful picture of the opening flower is rudely pushed aside and hopelessly distorted. A little farther on,—

> Bells, shake out your iron flowers
> Rubbing, chiming from the towers,
> Let your black, melodious blossoms float about these dismal bowers.

Here a fine and original idea is positively shattered by that wretched word rubbing, which is worse than meaningless—it is brutal. It is like flinging a stone at a beautiful statue, a comparison which is suggested to me by the second poem in Mr. Josephare's book. Mr. Josephare has no need to demolish his statues, but he has need to study the best masters of verse and not to spare that labor which makes for excellence in poetry as in other things. Mr. Josephare has power. He shows none of that utter flabbiness, feebleness and inanity that make so much later verse a weariness to the soul. His faults are those of youth and inexperience with perhaps a Whitman-like scorn for polish and propriety. And whether by accident or design he occasionally gives us a nearly flawless passage, such as the following from "The Enchanted Night":

> And forget me not
> When the night birds fly
> Through the haunted grot,
> When the satin moon is in the sapphire sky
> And the nightingale makes Heaven's waiting harps reply.

The writer is unusually happy in some of his more unpretending lyrics such as Half-Past Eleven, Ballade of the Natural Heart, Madeline, The Suicide and others. [A. M. Robertson, publisher.]

It is no misuse of a hackneyed word to call Grace Hibbard's "California Violets" dainty. The epithet applies equally well to the little purple and white flower-bespent cover and to the fragrant little poems inside. Strong they certainly are not, but is it not enough that a violet is sweet?

> Because you mirror the skies,
> In color of heaven's own blue.
> For your sweet and dainty selves,
> Violets, I love you.

we may well say in the words of the prelude. The following charming little thing will give a fair idea of the mood and manner of the greater number:

DANDELION DOWN

> Where are you winging, ghost of a flower?
> You seemed but a star in the spring-tide bright.
> Where are you wafting, drifting, floating,
> Down of a flower, feathery white?
> You'll frighten roses with thoughts of dying,
> They'll shiver and shudder at you so white:
> You've found your wings soft-tipped with silver
> And spirit-like drift in the pale moonlight.
> Oh, cease your wanderings, wraith of a flower
> Oh, hide yourself in the soft, brown mould,
> And another spring-time the sun will kiss thee
> Back to a star-like blossom of gold.

SAN FRANCISCO, DEC. 21, 1900

DR. WONG WOO

To all whom it may concern: In December, 1899, I was taken sick with Black Typhoid Fever, the most virulent type known to medical science. I had hemorrhages both nasal and intestinal, eight of the latter occurring in one day. Dr. Wong Woo, eminent Chinese physician, who called and with one dose of his tea stopped the flow of blood, thereby saving my life, as I had been given up by my white physician, as well as by all my friends. Was unconscious four weeks, but by Dr. Wong Woo's wonderful skill he saved my life from this most fatal of all fevers. Although I was confined to my bed three months, was able to resume my vocation in six months from the time I went to bed, and now I weigh 202 pounds, more than I ever attained previously. I would cheerfully recommend Dr Wong Woo to any one in need of a first-class physician for any cause whatsoever.

Some Social History

What a romance—that "Handsome Bob Jewett" should have fallen heir to nearly a million dollars! Nearly thirty years ago he was a young clerk in his brother's furniture store in Broadway, Oakland, and at any time in the day might have been seen about the store in his shirt sleeves, but always with his stove pipe hat, for Bob was a lady killer even in those days and the eternal feminine was always sure of a sweet smile or a complimentary remark whenever chance favored, and trust Bob to make the chance. Then came his first public affair—which shocked all Oakland. It was a story of a young girl, a marriage certificate that was pretty to look at—a three weeks' stay in San Francisco—and then—fresh fields and pastures new for both of them. The lady's father died, some say his heart was broken—she came to San Francisco and quickly became a belle of the half world. Here she met a man whose satiated fancy was captivated by her youth and beauty, and she lost no time in placing herself under his protection. His life went out in the waters of the bay—and she again became an habitue of the half-world. Again she captivated the fancy of an elderly man—this time a widower with one son. With a faith that was only equaled by his infatuation the man made the gay demi mondaine a proposition and solemnly swore to his part of it before the woman's family. "If you," said he, "will go to a convent in Montreal and remain there for one year, living a secluded and virtuous life, I will pay all expenses, and marry you when the year is up." He was as good as his word. He made the sport of wealthy men "an honest woman" once again. I often wonder if she did not find her respectability galling and a trifle irksome at times.

It was at the zenith of the popularity of the Clara Morris type of plays when Jeffreys Lewis played the adventuress Countess Zicka and Forget-Me-Not—when Clara Morris harrowed the soul of every woman with a past she fain would conceal, yet could not, by playing "Raymonde," and the woman of the scarlet letter sat with the ermine of married respectability over her breast and watched the play while a host of her old-time Oakland acquaintances, yes—even some of her girlhood's friends in the peaceful convent of the Sacred Heart, all sat there and watched her—saw her soul looking out in agony through her eyes as the woman on the stage was morally flayed alive for a life that was a counterpart of what her own life had been.

But it must be that the fetters of respectable married life were chafing. She flirted with her step-son, and even traveled in Europe with him. Her husband—with the shrewdness and the suspicion borne of his knowledge of what his wife had been before he married her—set detectives upon her track. Not to dwell too long upon the story, suffice to say that the woman left the man who tried to give her respectability and a name—and finally married the son of the firm to which her husband was in debt. And this circumstance was used to suppress the scandal of an open suit for divorce with her present husband as co-respondent.

has maintained its supremacy.

But Jewett? His life has been one long success. Shortly after his early affair he married the widow of a stock broker, the eldest daughter of an old-time candy manufacturer who for many years was a pillar in Methodist church circles. Then Bob fell heir to a seat in the San Francisco Call Board, or did his wife buy it for him with her first husband's money? At any rate, the furniture clerk became the stock broker and lived an ideally happy life with his wife in her elegant home in Oakland, until she died very suddenly. And Bob has fallen heir to a fortune! Time's changes are many.

SUMMONS IN DIVORCE

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Department No. 5

FLORENCE G. TILTON, Plaintiff
vs.
CHARLES O. TILTON, Defendant

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:
CHARLES O. TILTON, Defendant

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of defendant's wilful neglect and wilful desertion of plaintiff also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 30th day of October in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and one.

TRADE MARK

Office Chief of Police

It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public Mr. George Mayerle of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I consulted Mr George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction.

Most Respectfully,
J. H. ANDERSON.

OUR OPINION

Roosevelt's Political Strategy

Ever since Theodore Roosevelt took the oath of office and promised to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor, it has been predicted by wise politicians in close touch with affairs in Washington that he would lock horns with the Senate. And the probability of his doing so filled many people with misgivings. Politicians and statesmen familiar with the machinery of government at Washington believe that a President cannot have a successful administration without kowtowing to the Senate. There are men in that autocratic body that exercise a tremendous influence on the affairs of the nation, and if they are not shown due deference by the Chief Magistrate they proceed to clog the wheels of legislation and harass the President at every turn. Now Teddy Roosevelt has the reputation of being an impetuous fellow with exceptional confidence in his ability to do things, and the supposition was that he would insist on ruling the roost, regardless of precedent and the deference due. But Roosevelt is not an inexperienced politician or a verdant statesman. He has played the game of politics ever since he left college. During his experience as a member of the Legislature of New York and as Governor of the State, he imbibed much technical knowledge. And the probability is that he will not find it necessary to truckle to the Senate. He has already done a few things which indicate that he is better than a raw hand in the game of politics. By placing Governor Shaw of Iowa in the Cabinet he has lured into his official fold the one man in the West who was regarded as a probable candidate for the Presidency in 1904, and at the same time he has won the enduring support in the Senate of Senator Allison, the father of the Senate, the chairman of the Republican senatorial caucus, and the greatest power in the Upper House. In appointing Payne to the Cabinet he won the support of Senator Spooner, one of the ablest men in the Senate. From the beginning he enjoyed the warm personal friendship of Senator Lodge, who is recognized as one of the most eminent statesmen in the country, and by clever tactics he has secured the allegiance of Aldrich of Rhode Island, chairman of the Committee on Finance. So Roosevelt has not been idle. He has been fortifying himself with the skill of an accomplished strategist. He has disarmed the men who might have proved his most powerful antagonists. And they are the men who can summon to his support the heaviest timber in the National Legislature. Teddy is surely a versatile chap. Rough riding is only one of his accomplishments.

The Spirit of Enterprise

Eastern Capital is looking with eager eye in this direction. The advice to young men of the East to go West and grow up with the country is as sound and wholesome as ever it was, and the young men are coming in greater numbers than ever before But their purpose is not to grow up with the country. They are coming to find enterprises in which to invest their money. The active, bustling business men of the East have become aware of the fact that San Francisco is a splendid field for investment, and that we of the Pacific coast are in sore need of a little new blood. They have discovered that we have fallen into the lazy habits of the Spaniards by whom this city was first settled, and that there are great opportunities here for hustlers with a little spare coin. They are going to show us how to get all that is coming to us in the strenuous Eastern way, and San Francisco is to be awakened from its lethargy. Old Rip Van Winkle Vining is to lose his job and our street railroads are to be operated in a manner calculated to evoke public enthusiasm. Old John Backnumber Stetson is to be sent away back, and no longer to be permitted to act as an obstacle to suburban development. The people of Marin county have reason to rejoice over the prospective abandonment of the silurian Stetson policy. Our old fogies who have been snoring at their desks east of Kearny street for nearly half a century have begun to rub their eyes and prepare to receive a few object lessons in modern business methods. We need no longer worry about the trade of the Pacific being diverted from this port. The infusion of new blood into our commercial arteries is bound to stimulate the spirit of enterprise which has been so long dormant. There is to be a loosening up all around, and our city will soon present the appearance of a wide-awake metropolis. The time is not far distant when we will be able to erect a sky-scraper in Market street in less than a year. Then perhaps we may have something to boast of other than the building of the Oregon.

Morgan's Good Example

Mr. Pierpont Morgan started the new year by a display of generosity unparalleled in the world of finance. He gave to each of his employes a year's salary, and his gifts aggregated two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The recent industrial disturbances were not in vain. Mr. Morgan has always been regarded as the incarnation of materialism. He has devoted all his energies to the task of accumulating money, but within the past year his attention has been distracted. He has been induced to stop thinking of consolidation schemes and to ponder for awhile the claims and rights of less fortunate human beings. As a consequence we find the great strategist of Wall street in the role of a philanthropist. But his munificence was not prompted by the spirit of charity. Mr. Morgan is a man of unusual common sense. He has an adequate appreciation of the strength and power of Labor, and recent happenings have awakened him to a realization of the danger of inviting conflict between Capital and the masses. He deems it advisable to promote a more amicable relationship between the men that toil and those that appropriate to themselves the bulk of the profits of labor. In disbursing a quarter of a million dollars in New Year's gifts he merely yielded to his employes a greater share of their earnings than they have been accustomed to receive. He has given an example which other employers would do well to follow. It is the sort of an example which should tend to establish a more harmonious relationship between the plutocrats of the country and those that have done so much toward the material well-being of the nation. And in this era of unprecedented prosperity there is no occasion to marvel at such generosity as that of Morgan. We are today the most affluent of peoples. Morgan is not the only man who can give away a quarter of a million out of the profits of the year without being required to economize during the next twelve months.

Talk about Knee Breeches

Every little while the suggestion emanates from some quarter that men's evening clothes should be made more picturesque. And invariably it is followed by the supplementary suggestion that the knee breeches of black satin and silk should be restored to vogue. Usually it is from a sartorial source that the suggestion emanates. Such a radical change of style as would be effected if the knee breeches were introduced would necessitate the ordering of new garments for many wardrobes. There would be a great boom in the tailoring business. But the latest advocate of knee breeches for men is the Ladies' Pictorial. According to that journal, during the "Coronation year"—as the current twelvemonth is already called—there will be an attempt to introduce knee breeches for correct evening dress. "With these," says the Pictorial, "men would continue to wear the present claw-hammer coat, stiff-fronted shirt and tie, but fancy waistcoats will be encouraged." The same journal declares that "the King is very keen on picturesqueness," and that that is why there is believed to be foundation for the report that the knee breeches are likely to come into fashion once more. Well, perhaps the Britishers are intent upon reviving the old fashion which is commended for its picturesqueness, and which enables proud man to exhibit his well-turned calf in public, but we are quite sure that there is not a sufficient number of Harry Lehrs in this country to popularize that style of raiment. The King may be "keen on picturesqueness," but he can't influence Americans in matters sartorial. There are a few that turn up their trousers, and there are some that wore a superfluous button on the waistcoat when Albert Edward was suffering from too much embonpoint, but the fashion never became general. No doubt many of our young athletes would like to parade their calves, and would therefore favor the introduction of knee breeches, but even in this land of athletes the spindleshank is more common than the shapely limb. Nothing could be more picturesque than Sam Shortridge or Horace Platt in knee breeches, but even the King could not tempt them to expose their nether extremities in silk stockings. We may safely rely on our national sense of humor to protect us from the threatened revival.

The Serial Story

Kipling has decided not to serialize his forthcoming novel, and this decision is taken as a pointer as to the future of the instalment story. It has been an open question for a number of years past, whether serializing hurt or helped a book. Opinions have been about equally divided, but publishers continued to negotiate for serial rights, so it was fair to conclude that the reading public wanted them. One publisher expressed the opinion that serial publication helped a good book and did not hurt a poor one. Many people who read novels in instalments in the magazines afterwards bought the books, and many who enjoyed the serial recommended it to friends, so that it became more widely known than if it appeared in covers at first, and when published in book form there was a host of readers waiting for it. Long ago, when there were fewer magazines and practically no libraries, the publication which secured a reasonably good or interesting story was sure to find appreciative subscribers, who read the instalments, discussed the plot and characters, speculated on the outcome, and in fact, gave as much of their minds to the tale as is now devoted to serious study. The generation that read their Dickens, Thackeray, Wilkie Collins and Trollope in this way learned to know the authors and their books as no generation since has done. Moreover, in those good old times a considerable interval of time elapsed between the end of the serial publication and the appearance of the book, and whether or not there is anything in the opinion often expressed that the old-time novel was better fitted for serial publication, the fact remains that readers who did not satisfy their curiosity in that way were obliged to exercise the virtue of patience. There were no cheap editions of readable books, and the family which had a modest shelf of classics was fortunate indeed, for only scholars and people of wealth and circumstance aspired to the ownership of a whole book case, much less a library. But now magazines have multiplied, cheap books are to be had at less than the cost of paper and binding, free libraries spring up in every hamlet, and the very serial is out in book form before the final chapters have seen light in a periodical. With the multiplicity of attractions and the heaps of books issued every week, not to say day, read through in haste, or barely looked over and cast aside for some newer product, it is a very deliberate reader who will give his mind to a story told in sections. Some of the leading magazines have already decided against continued stories, and it is only a question of time when the serial will finally disappear.

The Saunterer

Bard vs. Perkins

The impression prevails in the higher political circles that Senator George C. Perkins has by a little adroit trimming established an entente cordiale with his erstwhile enemies which insures his re-election. Perkins mixed up in the last Senatorial fight in the interest of Grant not because he liked Burns less but because he loved himself more. He wanted a man from the South to succeed White so that when his term expired he would not be disqualified from a geographical standpoint. A man from the South was elected much to the satisfaction of Perkins, but since then the friends of Dan Burns have been eagerly awaiting an opportunity to smash the canny George C.

A Strategic Play

Meanwhile the Bard men have been manoeuvreing with a view of strengthening their political machine in San Francisco. There is nothing like patronage to give strength to a political machine, and the Bard men came to the conclusion that it behooved them to get control of the Internal Revenue office. That office is the federal stronghold of the Burns forces. To capture it would be as important a piece of strategy as the taking of a kop in South Africa by the British. So it was decided to have Collector Lynch ousted on the ground that he was violating civil service rules by taking too active a part in politics. Of course it was the intention of the Bard men to continue the violation of the same rules, but they had no conscientious scruples against breaking into the office on any old ground. Of course they counted on Perkins' support. He was supposed to be allied with them. But when it came to a show-down the artful dodger from Oakland was found in the opposition camp. The Bard men had been outmanoeuvred, and they lost.

The Perkins Motto

The supposition is that Senator Perkins made a new deal. He has switched from the Bard forces, with the understanding no doubt that he will receive the support of what is known as the Burns element. I have no doubt that the Bard people accuse him of treachery, but the senator probably soothes his conscience with the reflection that all is fair in love and politics. He believes that to hold an office one must always be prepared to jump to the right side. Be ever on the qui vive to get in out of the wet is his motto. Isn't it amusing to watch our proud and haughty statesmen doing politics? There isn't a vast difference between their methods and those of the slum workers. Indeed, even in the slums there is to be found a sense of honor of which some of our dignified statesmen are bereft. The case of Senator Perkins is one that should be watched with interest. Perhaps he has made a bargain which is not such a safe one as he imagines.

The Coming Scrap

And the situation is pregnant with political deals of all sorts. The Perkins flop augurs well for the Gage program, and disconcerts the friends of Otis and Flint who have been figuring on the capture of the State machine. The coming battle between the Republican forces is destined to be one of the most bitter ever fought in this State. It involves not only the gubernatorial office and the Senatorial toga, but also the Supreme Court. And not the least interesting feature will be the scramble for seats on the bench.

The Whittiers His Guests

The Willie Whittiers were guests of Mr. Ed. Purser at Marchand's the other night. At an adjoining table were the Walter Martins and I was impressed with the frigidity of the atmosphere in that vicinity. Perhaps the ice in the champagne buckets had something to do with it. Though Mr. Purser has not the cachet of fashion he appears to stand well in the smart set. He has the air of a capitalist, the form of a gentleman of leisure, the eye of a dreamer and a face that bespeaks an artistic soul. But he is a capitalist only when the ponies run to form. A gentleman of leisure he is at all times and he does his dreaming over the dope-book. His artistic soul asserts itself in the cut of his hair. A few years ago Mr. Purser was world-renowned as a plunger. In the heyday of his notoriety on the turf the elevation of his finger was sufficient to command the respectful attention of the bookies. But in the last two seasons there has been none so reubenesque as to take his marker. Such are the ups and downs of life on the track.

Rich Heiresses

By the death of Pardon Cook, the old pioneer, last week, his widow and three daughters will step into a very large fortune. Mr. Cook owned the solid block bounded by Sutter, Bush, Pierce and Scott streets, also other real estate valued at fully five hundred thousand dollars. Beside this he had about four hundred thousand dollars in bank and securities, which brings the estate up to nearly a million. Mr. Cook was an eccentric man and did not believe in improving his real estate to a great extent. He leased part of his block to the California Tennis club and built a few scattering houses on some of the other lots for which he received moderate rents. His own home, near Pierce street, is a plain two-story frame building far from pretentious. The rich man used to spend most of his time working in his garden or in the plat on which vegetables were planted. His second daughter married not long ago. It was a love match and not a brilliant one from a financial point of view, but her father did not put forth any objections to it. "They love each other," he said, "and we have plenty for all." So he gave the young couple his blessing and built a cottage for them around the corner from the family residence.

The youngest daughter was to have been married last month, but her father's illness delayed the match. Her fiance is Dr. Paul Noble, a recent graduate of the Cooper Medical college. He is a son of Burr Noble and his sisters, Pearl (Mrs. Edward Abramson) and Maude are very prominent in musical circles. The latter, like her brother, took a course in medicine at the Cooper. The eldest of the Cook heiresses is unmarried. They are all very young women.

Why Bret Harte Isn't Popular

It has been said that the extinction of Bret Harte would be the best thing that could ever happen to California, the supposition being that the wrong impression given by his writings had wrought incalculable harm which years of progress could not overcome. English and Eastern people who admire Harte's writings and who recently shed tears when the writer was declared at the point of death, have often wondered at his unpopularity in his old home, and have explained it by quoting the old proverb about the prophet without honor. But the fact is that many of Harte's old comrades who concede his greatness as a writer dislike him as a man. Ina Coolbrith is one who might explain why Bret is not honored in California. Miss Coolbrith knew Harte very well when the latter lived here, and the two poets were friends. When Harte left for the East he volunteered to take Miss Coolbrith's little manuscript volume of poems with him and find a publisher for it. He said that an Eastern man would make better terms than a local publisher. Miss Coolbrith naturally accepted the offer with thanks, for to have a sponsor like the already noted Harte she knew would prove open sesame to a publisher's office.

Well, Harte went to New Jersey and thence to Europe, having obtained an appointment as United States Consul to a German city. Nothing was heard of the volume of poems for ten years, when Miss Coolbrith, having given up all hope of Harte's help, had the verses published locally. The volume was entitled "A Perfect Day and Other Poems." Her wish had been to place the book in her mother's hand but that hope was denied as Mrs. Coolbrith died five years after Bret Harte went away with her daughter's manuscript.

Harte and Lawrence Barrett

Lawrence Barrett the actor was another who mourned a misplaced confidence in Bret Harte. Barrett lived in New Jersey and when Bret Harte visited that State he asked the actor to look up a nice house for him. Barrett secured a residence for Harte and introduced him to a furniture dealer who fitted out the house most luxuriously. The author expressed satisfaction with everything, but his delight never spread to settling the bills. When he finally went abroad he had paid for nothing and Barrett, rather than have the landlord and furniture dealer suffer, settled all the accounts.

Once more I am constrained to inform some very entertaining correspondents that anonymous communications are not deemed available for publication in these columns when they contain matter that is likely to wound the feelings of the people discussed. "A Subscriber" sent me a good story this week, but it cannot be given to my readers because the identity of the writer has not been disclosed.

Reviving the Gaelic Language

The Celtic movement is forging ahead in this city. Its guiding spirit is Father P. C. Yorke, who has already made considerable history, and whose aggressiveness and fearlessness have excited both the admiration and timidity of many prominent citizens. Though his acts do not always meet with approval even in his own Church, he sticks to principle against all odds and commands respect for his courage in quarters where his judgment is deprecated. He is not more zealous in defense of his Church than in the espousal of the cause of his native land. He is now devoting himself to the preservation of the Gaelic tongue, and the purpose of his Celtic movement is to arouse in the breasts of Irish men and women a love for the language of their forefathers. He believes that by so doing he will promote a higher appreciation of Irish history and a deeper affection for the mother country.

What They Purpose Doing

Father Yorke contends that if the early Irish immigrants who spoke the Gaelic from their cradle had clung to that language this would now be a Gaelic and not an Anglo-Saxon country. And I understand that many of those that have become interested in the Celtic movement expect to advocate in the near future the teaching of the Cinderella of languages in the public schools. There are many of us that are opposed to the teaching of the foreign languages in the public schools, believing that it is not the duty of the State to seek to endow children with unnecessary accomplishments, but if the German is taught, why not the Gaelic? Meanwhile, however, the Celtic movement is destined to make great progress in San Francisco, and in the near future thousands of Irish parents will perhaps make the language of St. Patrick the vernacular of their homes.

Condemned Herself to Social Extinction

Fate plays its pranks in strange ways. Last week I commented on the eminently respectable woman who was brought to ignominy and social shame through the gross mistake of an ignorant clerk who had her arrested for shoplifting. This week I heard a story of a woman—her name is frequently mentioned in the society columns of the dailies—who was actually detected while shoplifting in a very prominent Kearny street store. Mark the difference in the ways the cases were handled: in the Kearny street case there was none of that brutality that characterized the Hale incident. The woman was quietly directed to accompany an attendant to the private office where the gravity of her offense was plainly set before her. Of course she broke down and there was a copious flood of tears. She promised to do anything if the management would not make the matter public. She was assured that under no circumstances should such a course be taken, provided that under no consideration would she ever again resort to such a practice. Of course she earnestly and vehemently assented. She volunteered to pay twice the value of the goods but the management declined to take more than the regular price. And so the incident closed. I wonder what her aristocratic family connections would say if they knew of the affair? It was partly to make a proper appearance as a relation of theirs that the woman took the things; at least she let drop a hint to that effect when she was tearfully pleading with the store management. At one time her branch of the family had loads of money, but speculation and bad management have played havoc with its investments.

Jordan and Wheeler

David Starr Jordan and Benjamin Ide Wheeler divided interest at the recent Teachers' convention at Pacific Grove. It was interesting to contrast the two university presidents. Jordan impresses one as the bigger man mentally as well as physically. He has less of the air of the pedagogue about him and he impresses you as being more of the man of the world than is the Chief Executive of Berkeley. There is not much of the academician in the manner or the address of Jordan. He has traveled extensively and he has hobnobbed with men in all walks of life, and his viewpoint is not always that of the student. Wheeler cannot divest himself of the air of the professor and yet he does not look the part, for he devotes a deal of his attention to his attire. He always dresses in correct form. Jordan, on the other hand, affects the hayseed in appearance. He escorted a young woman to the ball at Del Monte, and he wore an old gray suit and heavy boots. And the next morning at an informal meeting of the teachers he appeared in a frock coat, as though he were trying to be correct.

Wheeler's Parting Words

Our School Superintendent, Mr. Webster, went to the convention firmly resolved to make a hit as the advocate of civil service. He was badly jarred by President Wheeler who declared that the public school system could never be in first-class shape until the superintendent became the appointee of the Board of Education. In the closing address Wheeler took a smash at all the teachers and professors by telling them that their addresses were pedantic, and that they were too fond of high-sounding phrases. He advised them to use simpler English, and then suggested that the "napkin of forgetfulness" be drawn over it all.

Synonymous with Umbrella

Anent the "package" controversy, it may be interesting to know that a well-known English dictionary professes to include what the compiler terms "Americanisms" and that amongst them is to be found this one: "Jag: an American term for an umbrella, as will be seen by the following illustration from an Albany (N. Y.) paper: 'Mr. Blank, a prominent citizen, returned from his club in a hilarious condition, and after vainly trying to unlock the front door with his umbrella, climbed through the coal hole. He was found asleep in the bath tub, fully dressed and with his jag.'"

Another Kind of Package

Perhaps the package acquired by members of the Bohemian club at Christmas time was not the kind of a one that many Examiner correspondents have described. It is assumed in the Examiner office that the members of the Bohemian club fan the flame of conviviality in the reckless, bibulous fashion of the founders of that organization. That is not so. The up-to-date Bohemian scorns booze. He is an æsthete. The soda cocktail is his favorite beverage. He considers a jag the limit in bad form. The stein songs no longer make merry the little hours in Bohemia's fashionable home in Post street. A few nights ago James D. Phelan, Peter Robertson and Chauncey St. John met by accident at the bar of the club.

"What'll you have?" asked the late Mayor.

"A little cold Bartlett water," said Robertson who is ever a teetotaler though his looks belie his thirst.

"And you?" asked Phelan addressing the Deputy Surveyor of Customs.

"Buttermilk," replied Chauncey.

The mixologists looked inquiringly at Phelan. "Under the circumstances," said Phelan, "I think you can give me a package of cigarettes."

Why Jags are Tabu

So, perhaps, after all it was not one of those vulgar packages that was referred to in connection with the Christmas jinks in Bohemia, and which has been described variously notwithstanding the sameness of ingredients. Since Peter Martin's memorable jag-speech in Bohemia, packages of the kind that he carried on that occasion are tabu. Liquor has caused a deal of trouble in polite club circles. It was not so long ago that Sidney M. Smith refused to settle a check for liquor at a midsummer jinks because he thought that too many members had accepted of his hospitality. The incident caused so much trouble that Sidney has never treated since.

Prodigal Smith

And Sidney Smith isn't such a bad fellow even though you can't trail him by the nickels he has dropped. I never knew how generous he was until the other day when I heard a story illustrative of his prodigality. It appears that he is well aware of his reputation for economy and that he took occasion to disabuse a friend's mind of the notion that he is as close as people say.

"Why," he declared, "nearly every week of my life I entertain from one to two guests at my table."

Then somebody told the friend another story. It was about certain members of Mr. Smith's family joining a golf club in San Rafael. He told them that as membership in the club involved the payment of dues and certain incidental expenses, they would have to sell their trap and horses which were an expensive luxury.

"But how can we get to the links, if we sell the horses?" they asked.

"Walk there," was the reply.

A Case of Charity

While on the subject of economy I am reminded of another story. Not long ago a seamstress was asked how she managed to hold her job so long in the family of a certain San Rafael millionaire. She explained that about the time she finished the work for which she had been engaged, a society girl living in the same town sent over several dresses to be sent to certain needy families. Instead of distributing the gowns the young ladies had them made over for themselves. Merely a case of charity beginning at home.

A New Fad in New York

The girls of New York's smart set are learning to box and their teacher in the manly art is a San Francisco girl. Millicent Levenberg went to New York more than a year ago to continue her vocal studies with the intention of going on the operatic stage. While studying she decided to open a gymnasium such as she once established in San Francisco, to teach society girls the delights of physical culture. Miss Levenberg was the first woman boxing teacher in this part of the world and at one time she had a large class of society girls.

The Kaffir Way

Apropos of the failure of a certain rich family to get an heir to its millions, a discussion arose the other night at the club and a San Francisco man who has lived in South Africa for the past two years remarked that the heir question was easily settled by the Kaffirs, in this way: "All the Kaffirs live in a kraal," he said, "which has its Induna or chief. They live together in perfect harmony, just like brothers and sisters. When a man from the outside wants a wife, he goes to the kraal and instead of asking the father of his intended bride for his daughter's hand he makes his request to the Induna. The price of a wife is fixed at so many cows. Twenty cows buy a very fine wife but an average one can be obtained for ten cows. The chief will never take the bridegroom's word for his pay. He says, to the buyer of a ten-cow girl: 'If your intentions are all right, your faith good, you will prove it by leaving with me two cows. Then you can go back and get the others.' The man does this, goes back to his farm and returns with—say, seven cows, remarking that he'll bring the other one later. But the chief will not listen to him. He insists on the whole ten or the man doesn't get his wife. The ten cows paid, the man takes his wife and goes.

Its Sad Sequel

year she is treated like a queen. Then comes the sequel, which is often sad for the poor Kaffir girl. If she has not given her husband an heir or heiress, and shows no signs of so doing, she is bundled back home. The chief has to give up her purchase price, the ten cows with any increase to the stock that has occurred during the year. And, saddest of all, when the girl's ex-husband again comes a-wooing to the kraal not one of his former wife's sisters is eligible to the position she has vacated. Her family is tabu with this particular wooer. And that is the way the heir question is settled among the Kaffirs."

Stetson's Liberality

There is much rejoicing among the denizens of Mill Valley over the retirement of John B. Stetson from the presidency of the North Pacific coast railroad. They feel that repairs will no longer be made with courtplaster and bale rope. Shortly before his retirement Mr. Stetson had an opportunity to give an exhibition of his liberality. He met Jennie Blair and her mother at the Sausalito ferry, and insisted on procuring tickets for them. The news of this act of liberality spread throughout Mill Valley and there was some talk of having it proclaimed on bulletin boards. Later on it was learned that Mr. Stetson saved twenty cents. The tickets were good for only the trip over.

London's Big Show

A Californian sojourning in London writes me that preparations for the Coronation are absorbing the attention of everybody. All London is looking forward with joyful expectation to the big regal show which gives promise of surpassing the most dazzling pageantry of the past. It is to be far more brilliant than the show which accompanied the crowning of Victoria, and will undoubtedly give a fillip to the trade and industries of the country. The procession of the King and Queen through London will precede the day of the Coronation, and there is to be a water pageant, it being the intention of their Majesties to return from London Bridge to Westminster on the Thames. All the swell modistes of London are now engaged in making Coronation robes. The peeress' robe is of crimson velvet, bordered with minever with rows of ermine fur on it. The dress to be worn underneath, known as a kirtle, is of pure white. Different materials may be used—lace, chiffon or satin—and these may be trimmed or embroidered with gold, silver, pearls or diamonds. The official regulations prescribe the length of train. That of a baroness is limited to three feet on the ground, with two rows of ermine on her cape and six silver balls on her coronet. A viscountess is allowed a train a yard and a quarter long, two rows and a half of ermine on her cape and a coronet of sixteen silver balls. A countess is allowed a yard and a half for a train, three rows of ermine and eight silver balls separated by eight strawberry leaves. An extra quarter of a yard is vouchsafed a marchioness and two yards constitute the train of a duchess.

The Robinson Reilys

The Robinson Reilys are spending the winter in Florida. Since the latest marriage of Genevieve Goad that was, her friends in this city have received but meagre reports of her doings and movements. It is believed however that she has found in Mr. Reily of Washington a most congenial companion and that he is very fond of her.

A Story of Revenge

There is nothing in fiction that appeals so strongly to the credulity of some men as that a club is as private as one's house and that proceedings there are sacredly secret from the world. There is no club so exclusive and private that proceedings within its walls are surrounded with that degree of secrecy which safeguards the affairs of a private family. No man of prominence was ever blackballed in a club in this city without the fact being disclosed beyond the club portals. Some of the choicest bits of gossip that go the rounds are started on their journey in the sacred precincts of our swellest and most exclusive clubs. The other day John H. Hammond was pilled in the Union club of New York, which is perhaps the richest club in America, and the fact is now known from one end of the country to the other. Not only that, it is known that the disgrace was put upon him because he married Emily Sloane whose mother was a Vanderbilt. He is a man of irreproachable character, a graduate of Yale and a member of the Knickerbocker club, but there is a feud between the Union club and the Vanderbilts, and Hammond was pilled.

The Ocean Disaster

From the evidence at hand it is pretty certain that the Walla Walla disaster was the result of gross negligence. The sailing vessel had the right of way and if the officers in charge of the steamer were attending strictly to their duties the collision might have been avoided. Before the testimony of the lookout was given those officers agreed that there were no lights on the French bark. That the officers were guilty of misrepresentation there is scarcely any doubt. The night was clear and even the warning of the lookout should not have been necessary. The conduct of the officers of the steamship company in seeking to suppress the facts is most reprehensible. The blame should be fixed, and the widest publicity should be courted.

Everybody drinks Gilt Edge Whiskey—Why? Because it is GOOD. WICHMAN, LUTGEN & CO., Sole Proprietors, S. F.

They Saved the Max

Notwithstanding the loss of life resulting from the apparently inexcusable collision the officers of the Walla Walla have not been, it appears, entirely deprived of ground for self-felicitation. In their opinion, if the bark Max had not collided with the steamship she would have gone ashore. She was heading for the shore, and was fortunately intercepted by the Walla Walla. But the officers of the sailing vessel are not grateful. The Max was a considerable distance off shore, and she could have changed her course long before reaching the breakers. The preponderance of evidence so far is against the Walla Walla, and I regret the fact, because Captain Hall is a gallant mariner, and he behaved superbly when he discovered that his vessel was lost. If he had been on the bridge the accident perhaps would not have occurred.

A Svengali Hypnotized

Signor Abramoff has been heard from. He has written to me from his studio in New York to contradict the story recently published in a morning daily, in which he was represented as a Svengali and Miss Paraskova Sandelin of Mill Valley as an unfortunate Trilby. It was stated that she was hypnotized into signing a contract by which he agreed to perfect her voice and she agreed to give him ten thousand dollars and one-quarter of her earnings on the operatic stage by way of compensation. She broke the contract and he sued for services rendered. Miss Sandelin then stated that he had agreed to secure her an engagement in a foreign opera house, but instead introduced her to the public in Fischer's music hall. Abramoff tells a different story. He represents himself to be a Svengali hypnotized.

Trilby in Tears

According to his story Miss Sandelin came to him five years ago for instruction. She was accompanied by a charitable lady, who agreed to pay for the cultivation of Miss Sandelin's voice. After seven months' study, Miss Sandelin came to his studio one morning in great despair and in tears. She explained that the charitable lady had decided to pay for no more lessons. "It was then," writes Abramoff, "that the terrible Svengali was hypnotized, for he offered to give Miss Trilby lessons on credit. After two years of study for which seven months only were paid, and after Miss Sandelin's voice had improved considerably I offered to make a contract with her to which she consented after consulting her lawyer and friends. The principal items of this 'cast-iron,' double-backed action contract provided that for all my trouble and for taking chances in seeking to make her a singer and to be her manager when she would have sufficiently advanced to be managed, I should receive twenty-five per cent of her earnings, and if she received a foreign engagement, fifty per cent for I would then have to accompany her on her travels. It was also provided that after the expiration of that terrible contract, she would be under no obligations to me. In other words, if she earned only two hundred and fifty dollars during the life of the contract, I would receive only sixty-five dollars for five years of hard work."

His Offer Rejected

Signor Abramoff contends that if such great artists as Barducci, Poletini, Bardaracco and other renowned singers did not consider it infra dig to appear at Fischer's, surely Miss Sandelin was not injuring her reputation as a singer by appearing there. He adds that after she broke her contract he told her lawyer that if she would pay half the amount due for lessons he would accept the money in full settlement of the account. A few days later the lawyer told him that he had urged her to accept the compromise offer and that she refused.

"Farewells" to the Martins

Before Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin leave on that long planned trip through the out-of-the-way places of Europe their friends are determined that they shall be the recipients of many farewell "loving" cups and "heartfelt" banquets and "devoted" dances. From the looks of the list of "events" their "farewell disappearance" promises to rival in a way the droll period of Patti's "farewell appearance." Ex-Mayor Phelan leads off among the entertainers with a big "farewell" dinner dance in their honor in the Maple room of the Palace hotel, this Saturday evening. It promises to be a very smart affair. Like "Prince" Holbrook, he has limited the number of guests to the enigmatical "fifty." That same magic number has cropped up very conspicuously in several events of late. Has the local smart set, after the manner of its cousins in the East, set the bars at those figures as being the numbers in which the circle of the socially elect may be most properly framed? This same entertainment brings another social fact into the lime light: dinner dances are becoming more frequent, which bears out a comment I made recently that society is becoming more generous in the style of its entertainments and is trying "to live up to its new mansions."

Entertaining Eastern Friends

This same Saturday afternoon the happy Martins will be given a "farewell" tea by Mrs. Henry Scott. Another tea will be given by Mrs. Gibbs in honor of an Eastern friend, who will be introduced to the local smart folks. The chances are that Mrs. Gibbs will do a lot of entertaining this season as a number of her Boston friends are going to pay her long promised visits, so the household will be gay with Back Bay liveliness, a kind that even Howells could grow genial over.

Oh, for a French Flirtation

A great flutter is looked for at the teas today. Men, as a rule, hate these crushes, but the officers of the French ship Protet are expected to make the rounds, and every bud and blossom is anxious for a French flirtation. Yet there is disappointment in some quarters because the officers are not so handsome as those that visited us a year ago. That beautiful, godlike young lieutenant with the black beard is missing, and life is not quite the same.

Marie Wells' Tea

Marie Wells was hostess at an "at home" Tuesday last. These "at homes" have risen to all the dignity of teas, and the young ladies that attend them wear beautiful gowns. Miss Wells had many callers, and she was in her sprightliest mood. By the way, she has the handsomest jewels of any girl in society. Amongst them are some beautiful rubies and opals.

Norris on Novels

It is a pleasure to learn that I have been misled into overestimating the commercial value of literary trash. So much booming do the modern novels receive, and so skillfully and excessively do the publishers lie, that I have been of the opinion that writers of ephemeral novels grew rich off the sales of their hackwork. But Frank Norris, who went East and became famous through the publication of "The Octopus," one of the notable successes of last year, declares that writing fiction is not a lucrative business. The success of a novel is extraordinary, he asserts, if twenty-five hundred copies are sold. At ten cents a copy the author's royalty amounts to two hundred and fifty dollars. Seldom does the sale exceed twenty-five hundred. Mr. Norris is authority for the statement that a novel may make a veritable stir, almost a sensation, and yet fail to sell. "I know," he says, "for an indisputable fact, that a certain novel which has been called the best American novel of the nineteenth century, and which upon publication was talked about, written about and even preached about, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, took ten years in which to attain the sale of ten thousand copies." From the statements of Mr. Norris I should judge that when a novel creates a stir the "stir" is confined to the men and women that write book reviews.

Strikingly Handsome Gowns

The McNear dinner dance in honor of Georgie Hopkins was the first formal smart home affair of the season and was distinguished by its rich gowns. So many compliments were passed on Georgie's stunning appearance that a visitor might have thought she was the beauty of the family, but a wise matron who knows the magical effects of good gowning declared her costume was responsible for a fair share of the admiration. The Hopkins girls have carried the local blue ribbon for modish gowns, but the garment Georgie wore at the entertainment was easily a gem among the rich creations they have introduced. An "oh, my!" gown was what its delighted admirers at once christened it. It was fashioned of a marvelous lacey texture, threaded with a striking silver-spangled design that was glitteringly new. The foundation was the palest pink silk; deeper pink velvet geraniums relieved the decollete bodice.

Cupid on a Hunt

Rumor hath it that Dan Cupid, having netted all the Hopkins girls, is now scanning the rose bushes trying to locate Carrie Taylor. She is a fine, slender, aristocratic looking girl and an immense favorite in her set. Her sister Emily, now Mrs. George Pope, is much handsomer as a matron than she was as a young girl. Like others in the same set she is accounted among the best-groomed women in town. The gown she wore at the recent Charity Ball created a stir among those who pride themselves on being stunningly gowned at such functions. Only the fairest of Tennyson's fair women could venture to wear it, but Mrs. Pope's serene blonde beauty was only softly accentuated by her "apple blosom" gown, achieved by a foundation of apple green silk covered with the airiest of Chantilly laces. The sash was only one of the distinctive features of the gown: its trailing ends were full blown blush pink roses caught on a scarf of tulle.

A Brave Attorney

It requires more than ordinary nerve to do the work that Deputy Attorney-General Charles N. Post is now performing in Alturas. There are some pretty tough citizens up in that desolate region, and they have an easy knack of taking the law into their own hands. When the Examiner undertook to force the law officers to prosecute the members of that cold-blooded band, there were many threats of violence. The first reporter sent to the scene did not dare write the news until after his departure from the county. But E. J. Livernash was next detailed to work up the case, and the desperadoes soon learned that he could not be bluffed or frightened. Attorney Post is of the same unflinching character as the newspaper man. I recall that during the administration of Governor Budd, Post was the man selected to go into Round Valley to prosecute the man that lynched Jack Littlefield. That was one of the most desperate gangs that ever infested the State. It was predicted that Post would soon be intimidated, and that he would be content with a lukewarm prosecution. But he wasn't. He was fearless then as now in the performance of his duty, and as a consequence three men were sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. And yet Charlie Post is one of the most modest-mannered men that ever popped a cork.

Good Financial Matches

Apropos of the marriages of Prince David Kawananakoa and Samuel Parker, the two distinguished Hawaiians, with Miss Abigail Campbell and her mother, there are a number of points which have escaped the notice of the newspapers. Both Sam Parker and the Prince have large estates but both are so deeply in debt that only a marriage to millions could put them beyond reach of bankruptcy. Prince David's entire fortune is merged in the Kapio'ani estate, in which his brother Cupid has a half interest. David has been a spendthrift always and has borrowed hundreds of thousands to indulge in women, wine and song. His estate owes the Campbell estate a quarter of a million dollars, but now the Prince has raised the mortgage by marrying one of the mortgagees. Sam Parker owns a million acres of land on the island of Hawaii, the biggest of the group, but he, too, has so encumbered his property that he is badly embarrassed. Sam's first wife died only a few months ago but when he went to San Jose where the widow Campbell was staying, he made such desperate love to her that he won her within the week, and persuaded her to marry him before her daughter was united to the Prince.

Sam Parker's Way

Just how Sam and David went through their fortunes is best illustrated by two incidents of recent happening. The day Sam was married, he was waited on by a reporter who wanted to know some of the particulars of his approaching nuptials. The reporter found the great Hawaiian in his room at the Occidental hotel, garbed in a kimono and barefooted. Sam greeted him pleasantly, replied to his questioning that he did not know when he would be married, and asked the newspaper man what he would drink. The reporter said Scotch whisky and Sam said gin. He told the bellboy to bring a bottle of each, two siphons of soda, and a box of the best imported cigars. This for two people. When the drinks and cigars came, he signed a card for twelve dollars, and handed the boy a ten-dollar gold piece for a tip.

How David Does Things

This is Sam's every-day custom and not a mere action of an ecstatic moment. Later a few friends dropped in on Sam, and persuaded him that he should be married that evening. Nothing loth, the former prime minister of the monarchy of Hawaii despatched a friend for the license, and summoning his friend. Judge Hebbard, was straightway made one with the handsome and wealthy Mrs. Campbell, who by the way is just forty-two years old. Instances of Prince David's prodigality may be cited by the score. The latest however is perhaps the best. About a month ago, David who was leaving Hawaii for San Francisco with Sam, Judge Gear and George Davis, bethought him that the trip on the steamship Alameda would be enlivened greatly if they had along some native musicians. He forthwith engaged the five best players of the ukulele, and singers of hula songs, and brought them along. He kept them here until a few days ago when he sent them back to Honolulu. Their passage money, wages and keep, cost the Prince over six hundred dollars. Once in Honolulu he paid a caterer two thousand dollars to serve a banquet at his residence.

The Campbell Mansion

When the Parkers and the Prince and his wife return to Honolulu, that city will see some of the most lavish entertaining since King Kalakaua the Gay died, a dozen years ago. The Parkers will live in the great mansion built by the bride's husband, James Campbell, and to which she has added a thirty thousand dollar addition in the past few months. A local firm—the Sterling Furniture company—is now making for her twenty thousand dollars' worth of furniture for this mansion. It will be equipped thoroughly with electric bells and each push button will be a jewel in the tone

Beloved by Royalty

The Campbells were always deeply attached to the the Hawaiian royal family. When James Campbell died the Queen and Prince David were the first to offer condolence to the family in their deep affliction. And in gayer scenes when Abbie Campbell wished for magnificent jewels to grace her station as Queen of the big Charity Mardi Gras ball in Honolulu last year, Liliuokalani insisted on her wearing her own royal jewels and in the kindness of her heart she threw great strings of pearls over the girl, and set the crown of emeralds, rubies and diamonds upon her head. And the first favor mother and daughter asked their husbands after marriage was that both wedding parties should go to Washington and receive the blessing of Liliuokalani.

Rise of a Great Sugar King

It is all a story of great fortune, romantic love and strange adventures in the balmy, lei-garlanded isles. It is a fortune of over four million dollars that the lovers have to spend, and it was founded by the most picturesque figure in Hawaii—old Jim Campbell. Fancy a man escaping from one of those old-time floating lazarettos, a whaler, joining the impecunious natives and in thirty years accumulating some four million dollars! At the time he went on shore in the harbor of Lahaina in 1852 there wasn't enough pennies in port to buy a keg of whisky. But he fell in love with the scenery and he decided to cast his lot with the natives. Ship's carpenter was his trade and he tinkered on the whalers that winter in the harbor. He married a daughter of a white man in the port; she died six years later and left him some property. Then he bought some land and started to farm sugar.

King Kamehameha V thought this a good idea and he started a plantation next door, but he soon grew tired of the venture and sold his royally equipped plant to Campbell for a song. Later on Campbell moved to Honolulu, married, and invested his cash in real estate and more sugar plantations. He started Honouluili, which later became the present big Ewa plantation, the marvel of the sugar world; he planned the famous Kanuka plantation. Then he came to California. He bought the St. James hotel and a lot of real estate in San Jose and sent his children to the convent there. His life was replete with lively and highly colored experiences. One of the most melodramatic occurred when he was kidnapped by thugs in this city. They used every effort to force him to sign a check for twenty thousand dollars to insure his release, but he steadfastly refused. He finally succeeded in escaping from the house where they had him confined, and he never rested in pursuing them till they were arrested. One of them is now serving sentence in San Quentin.

Jesse Moore Whiskies are famous the world over for purity and flavor as well as for all the other qualities that make good whiskey.

Handsome Frank Sullivan

It was rather cruel to taunt our new Park Commissioner, Mr. Sullivan, with the story of his vanity, which has so long been forgotten. When he ran for Congress, many years ago, he was a very young man and no doubt, in the innocence of that adolescent period, he entertained an erroneous notion of the relative value of pulchritude and brains. He did not exaggerate wilfully if he pointed with pride to himself in those days as a perfect man. Of course, he referred to his physical qualities. And he was a handsome fellow. If people were looking for Apollos to represent them in Congress in those days, Frank J. Sullivan would have had a cinch on the job. But I fancy that he has long since ceased to bother himself about his beauty. Let us hope that the time spent in personal contemplation in the days of his youth was not wasted, and that now he may devote himself to the work of beautifying the Park with the same assiduity with which he formerly attended to his own adornment.

Remodeled Her Form

Anna Lichter is coming back to the Tivoli, and she is prepared to wear tights. During her last engagement as prima donna of the Tivoli company she did not make a good front in tights. Her voice was charming, but her legs were somewhat off the key. A voice is not alone essential to success in prima donna roles in comic opera. It was the judgment of experts that Miss Lichter was more prepossessing in long skirts than when she wore them not. If people could be induced to listen, and not look, she would make a great hit in any sort of a costume. But I am assured that she has changed her figure. By judicious banting she has restored the original lines of beauty, and now her form is as fetching as her voice.

A Brilliant Girl

Miss Elizabeth Mills, or as she is better known, Miss Bessie Mills, should really be a debutante this season. She receives at every tea and goes everywhere, but she is to have no formal coming-out. She is a student at Berkeley, and a member of the K. K. G., the swellest sorority across the bay. She is a brilliant girl, and is regarded as one of the best students that ever attended the University of California. She has made wonderful progress, distinguishing herself by doing three years' work in one.

Expecting a Golden Shower

Mrs. Shain has taken her two younger children and gone East to join her daughter Grace. Rumor has it that the family fortunes are at last not only to be rehabilitated but regilded, and in a manner to suit the most exacting taste. Friends here have been warned to shortly expect the most surprising news. From the air of mystery surrounding the hint, it can be nothing short of a marriage. At last accounts Grace Shain was in the chorus and doing fairly well. When and where Prince Moneybags descended in his airship is puzzling her friends here who keep tab on her letters. But they all agree that Mrs. Shain was greatly excited over the golden prospects of the family when she left for the East.

The Schmitz Debut

Mayor Schmitz has made a good beginning. The men selected by him for the Commissions are less objectionable than some of those put into office by Mayor Phelan. They are not so well known as the Phelan appointees, and consequently there is less likelihood of objection being urged against them. The man with a past is always vulnerable. There are no veteran job-chasers in the Schmitz political family. He fought shy of such barnacles as John H. Grady, the ex-Tax Collector, who had an experience with a Grand Jury, and of perpetual tax-eaters of the Jim Denman stripe. No such pliant tool as Pin Head McCarthy won the favor of Mayor Schmitz, and he didn't deem it advisable to give tone to his Administration by selecting such giddy representatives of the ton as Jack Casserly and George Newhall. I do not expect Eugene Schmitz to make a better Mayor than James D. Phelan. It would be absurd to deny Mr. Phelan the praise to which he is entitled, but one cannot help regretting that he never had the good fortune to enjoy that priceless education which is to be acquired only in that great common school of experience to which caste is unknown.

Just a few Hints

In his message to the Board of Supervisors Mayor Schmitz threw out some pretty strong hints as to the policy he intends to pursue. I should judge from his remarks that he intends to undertake the overthrow of a few commissions, and that he has some strong cards up his sleeve. He paid his respects to the voracious Board of Public Works, which is the most expensive luxury the city has ever known, and he intimated that there was good and sufficient ground for the removal of a Civil Service Commissioner who devoted his time to the upbuilding of a pernicious political machine. Ther was no necessity for mentioning names, for everybody knew he referred to P. Hypocrite McCarthy. And his charge against the Police Commission of having thrown the weight of its influence against one side of the industrial battle warrants the assumption that he contemplates calling the Commissoners to account. So, the probability is that there will be some lively skirmishing at the City Hall in the near future. If the new Mayor attempts to do all that he is expected to do the survivors of the Phelan Administration will be kept in a state of nervous expectancy.

One Not Unknown

There is one of the new Mayor's appointees who is not altogether unknown. I refer to Attorney Hutton, who was appointed to the Police Commission. Mr. Hutton is a lawyer but he is not one of the prominent members of the bar, though he has considerable practice as the representative of the Sailors' Union. He married the widow of Dr. Horner, and she had quite a nice fortune. Dr. Horner's death was a tragic one. Mr. Hutton was the attorney for the Baroness von Turkheim of unsavory memory, and now he is the representative of a Mrs. Hutchings who is trying to prove that she is the daughter of Albert Tanyer and the heir to his forty thousand dollar estate. It is a very strange case and promises some very sensational developments. Nearly all the important events which connect Mrs. Hutchings with the estate took place at sea or in places that have been destroyed by fire.

Ways that are Dark

Judging from the allegations of the complaint in the suit instituted by the Smith Cash Store against the First National bank, Mr. S. G. Murphy the President of that institution, has been up to his old tricks again. According to the complaint the bank deducted the amount of a note due the institution from moneys on deposit in the name of the plaintiff. Thereafter the plaintiff's checks were dishonored and the plaintiff's credit ruined. Surely if the statements of the plaintiff are true the bank cannot avoid being mulcted in heavy damages. you cannot deprive a man of his property without due process of law, but President Murphy of the First National Bank snaps his fingers at the law when his interests are involved. He showed his contempt for the law when he appropriated to his own use the money of Mrs. Colton which she had on deposit. I should not care to do business with such a bank as the First National of San Francisco.

If Funston Gets the Post

If General Funston should be put in command at the Presidio as the papers predict, it will be interesting to watch developments socially. Officers promoted from volunteer service into the regular army are seldom received with open arms at the posts, for snubbing is as conspicuous there as it is among civilian pretenders. The wives and daughters of erstwhile volunteer officers usually find it hard to break in. But it may be different in the case of the commanding officer. Mrs. Funston is a beauty and is young and talented. Her mother is a music teacher and all the daughters are fine musicians.

Morrow-Roosevelt

The marriage of Miss Eleanor Morrow, daughter of Judge and Mrs. Morrow, and Lieutenant Harry L. Roosevelt, U. S. Marine Corps, a cousin of President Roosevelt, will take place next Wednesday at the home of the bride's parents in San Rafael. The wedding was originally fixed for May next, but Lieutenant Roosevelt having just received orders from Washington to proceed to Manila at once, the date of the wedding has been altered, and the bride and groom will leave on the next transport sailing from this city. The wedding will be strictly private, only the most intimate friends and relatives of the contracting parties being present.

He's of the Right Stuff

Lieutenant Roosevelt is a gallant young officer who has already done good service for his country. He entered the Naval Academy in July, 1896 and was ordered to sea, May 28, 1898 for active service during the Spanish war. He saw active service on the Newark, Machias, Lancaster, Mayflower and Solace. He was under fire of the Spanish batteries at Santiago while on the Newark. He was commissioned second lieutenant, in the marine corps, Dec. 8th, 1899 and was promoted to a first lieutenancy July 28th, 1900. He has been in command of the marine barracks at the Naval Training Station at this port since last August.

The King Says Dance

The buds and younger belles are feeling greatly encouraged. Word has come from London that dancing is again popular. The King, even at his age and with his super-avoirdupois, is very partial to the recreation. Englishmen by the way do not as a rule dance well. Only a few of them have mastered the manoeuvre of reversing. But our San Francisco men who dance know how to dance. The trouble is they have not cared to display their accomplishment for such a long time that it is possible they have forgotten how to trip the light fantastic in the valse or deux temps. At the dinner dances Mrs. Eleanor Martin loves to give most of the dancing men are of tender years. They are good only to dance with; to flirt with, or as eligible suitors they are exasperatingly impossible.

A Wedding Incident

Miss Dole of Riverside was married to Mr. Emmett Jones on New Year's night. It was one of the smartest weddings that have occurred in Riverside for years back, and the papers described it in detail. However, one incident that sent the witnesses off into gales of laughter has not, I believe, been chronicled. Two little kittens got into the church just before the ceremony and one of them was so bold as to go up into the chancel and play with the bride's veil as she knelt.

Another Dramatic Aspirant

It is astonishing how many young women in the Jewish set decide upon stage careers. The latest is Eleanor Haber, so well known in the exclusive Philomath circle. Miss Haber is handsome and has a good figure and she understands how to dress. She is going to give a dramatic recital next Thursday evening when the public may judge of her talent. Albert Elkus and Harry Samuels will assist.

How Buds are Introduced in Gotham

The latest method of introducing buds in New York is to present them at theatre parties. It is no longer considered the best of form to launch the bud with a splurge. A small tea, lacking show, has been the ordinary mode of bringing forth the bud, but this is now superseded by the theatre party. Thus all formality is cast to the winds. A theatre party, with a supper afterwards, is nothing if not gay and out of the prescribed form of debut affairs. A theatre party is usually a nuisance, but if theatrical managers are going to encourage the introduction of buds through that medium they should suffer the consequence of public disapproval. People that go to the theatre to witness a performance should not be compelled to suffer distraction.

The Sullivans are still in it. We lost a Chief of Police but we gained a Park Commissioner.

Fed by Mrs. Parrott

One does not know what to believe about Mammy Pleasant. Her most intimate friends declare that she is a poor innocent who has been the victim of schemes all her life, and that she is now on the verge of starvation. There are others who believe she is only shamming. At any rate she appears to be poverty-stricken. She lives alone and almost deserted in a down-town room. I hear that Mrs. Tiburcio Parrott keeps her alive with broths and chowders. Mrs. Parrott was a Miss Therese Tafly and she came from Carson, Nevada. She had considerable talent as an artist, and came to this city to study art. Tiburcio Parrott had an artistic temperament and haunted the studios. In one of them he met the young Nevada girl, fell in love with her and married her. That was about fifteen years ago. They lived in a beautiful palace near St. Helena. They spent about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in beautifying the home. Now, it may be purchased for less than half that sum.

She was Sarah Althea's Friend

The plight of Mammy Pleasant will no doubt start recollections once more of the unhappy fate of many of the original characters in that celebrated court drama which grew out of Sarah Althea Hill's claim to wifehood. It was said at one time that all the people that figured in the early historyof the famous Sharon case were victims of a strange fatality. Certainly many of them were overcome by curious reverses. George Washington Tyler, the first attorney for the plaintiff, was disbarred, and Judge Terry was killed. One or two of the witnesses went to the penitentiary. Another figured in a domestic scandal, a clerk for Attorney Tyler became a fugitive from justice, and the plaintiff was sent to an insane asylum. And now Mammy Pleasant, who was one of the first to espouse the cause of Sarah Althea, excites commiseration in her loneliness and poverty.

The Announcement Confirmed

A fortnight ago I announced the engagement of Edith McBean and Dr. Kierstedt, U. S. A., but the young lady denied the report to her most intimate friends as late as Monday of this week. I was beginning to think that my announcement was premature, but on Wednesday Miss McBean sent notes to all her friends assuring them that my news was true. There was no hitch that I know of, but there was some little hesitation due to the bread-and-butter question, which is a serious one when it confronts a fashionable girl of the Burlingame set. The salary of a first lieutenant in the army is not large enough to insure a young matron a real lively time in the social whirl. But Papa McBean, though not tremendously rich, has agreed to make his charming daughter a handsome allowance.

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

The Widow's Story

When James Herodotus Canfield left me his blessing and a rent roll of fifty thonsand per annum, he hadn't an idea of consequences. But that was Canfield all over; he never did look to results. He didn't dream now what it would be to be a widow and a rich young widow at that; though now that I recall it, he had decided views upon the subject of second marriages.

How often have I heard him say "No man wants a second-hand piece of furniture, Nell, even if it is a knock-down bargain. No, my dear madam, no!—don't you associate widows with sentiment. A rich widow's married for the stuff, and God knows the devil himself wouldn't have a poor widow."

Can was a good fellow though, even if he did go off on a jag; and I don't know as he was to blame for that either, bein' as it was he run up from corn bread and cabbage to caviar and champagne—all in a single night.

You must excuse my calling him Can, but that's the name he went by when he sold bacon and beans in Holden. It was Can this, or Can that, all the time those days, or plain little simple J. H. Dear me, dear me,—why nobody in Holden would ever have believed that he could graduate into James Herodotus,—not he! Nor that he could be guilty of a bucket shop deal that would make us millionaires in a night.

Yet that's the very thing that happened. Holden was too small for us then—as Canfield said, and that meant New York or Paree—or both. Can could not speak French very glibly, and neither could I. So we just decided we'd best go where we could talk and hear talk and be right up to the top notch o' things.

Poor Canfield! What with the late suppers and the wine and the—and all that—he just sort o' collapsed.

After Canfield died, and that's been five years ago this June, I put on weeds. I did the proper thing and mourned and mourned—my goodness! how I did mourn for Can. Then came the neighbors one and all to tell me that it was time I quit mourning; that everybody on the avenue was criticising me for mourning so long. That's women for you. If you don't cry they'll talk, and if you do cry they'll talk. They'll do it every time, and New York women's no different from Holden. About this time I went to California. I didn't want to go one bit, but they wouldn't let me stay—society people, you know. "You've got money to burn, why don't you burn it? The proper thing for you to do is to winter in California. All the swagger set do it, and you really must be swagger."

It was beautiful out there in San Diego where the sun shines all day every day, and the flowers are as big as cabbages; but somehow I got tired of that beautiful sameness, and I wondered if Can didn't get tired of Heaven sometimes if it were all flowers and sunshine continuous. One day when I was thinking along in this strain, Mrs. Snow came up behind me.

"You're a mighty sweet and pretty little woman, Mrs. C.," said Mrs. Snow, "and I know you'll have just heaps of fun over here."

Mrs. Snow was from Kentucky, and she always said "mighty" and "heaps," but I found her such a kind little soul, I didn't mind it. Why, there's people in Holden that don't talk a bit better than she did, but they're just as good as gold—that's what they are. You mustn't judge a woman by her grammar no more'n by her gowns. Nine times out of ten you'll regret it if you do.

"You'll just have heaps of fun over here," she repeated, warmly. "I was the one that brought you over here to the Beach, you know, and I reckon I can do the rest. Just lay aside that gloomy old veil, honey, and come into the ball tonight. I'm going, and I'll introduce you to the Colonel."

"The Colonel, indeed," I replied indignantly. "None of your hot stuff Kentuckians' for me. Thanks—I'd rather not."

"But really, my dear, you'll enjoy him; he's the talk of the Beach. And he's from New York, too—born in Kentucky but drifted on to New York when he was grown."

"Drifted on to New York, did he? Why, that's just what I did and that seems to be just what everybody else wants to do. I feel sorry for New York! It must be awful to be so much in demand. With Holden, now, it was different! everybody wanted to leave Holden."

Well, I met the Colonel. He was delightful—so was the ball which was an exceedingly stiff and stately affair. It was Gotham right over again, though. Nearly every one present was from New York and had a Van before his name; or if he wasn't he wanted to be. For my part, I don't know why we all went so far to see what we could see at home. I didn't meet a soul that night but the Colonel, but he was awfully nice. Tall and slim and quiet just like Can—only more book learning. Can, now, never could spell—never in this world, but the Colonel—bless your soul—could spell and write, too. He was a newspaper man. The ball was just the beginning of my season at the Beach, but if I'd a known what was coming, I'd a made it the end. Just as I told Mrs. Snow, "it was enjoyment you didn't enjoy." It does seem sometimes as if people go to lots of trouble to make themselves miserable, and then they say they're right in the swim.

"Oh, it's awful to be at Coronado in the winter; it's equally as bad as Newport in the summer."

"Newport in the summer?" said Mrs. Snow, "well, I've never been to Newport so I can't draw comparisons, but if it's swelldom in its swellest you want, I say give me the Hotel del Coronado every time."

And I think she was right about it, too. That was the sole attraction of the Beach, where everything was held, from a regulation "bal de poudre" to the Salvation Army. That isn't a simple figure of speech, either. We did have the Salvationists the first Sunday I was out there. Mr. B. who ran the Coronado, he of Evansville, you know, who left Indiana a poor little nobody and returned there a year or two later well nigh a millionaire—well, Mr. B. of Evansville, thought it would be a very clever idea to give up that immense ball room one Sunday night to the Salvationists. Mrs. Snow was the one to tell me about it, and she suggested that we be sure to go in and hear them, which we did.

My, but my dear sir, it was a sight I'll long remember. The world of folly on one side and the little band of Salvationists on the other. One saying, "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we must die," the other pleading—"No, no, no; for if a man die he shall live again."

It was downright shameful, too, the sport that was made of those dear little poke-bonneted lassies. You would think it was a circus in their eyes—though God knows it wasn't. It was just as Adjutant Molly said when it came her turn to speak:

"Ladies and gentlemen," says she, "and friends: You may think we're fanatics; you may think we're fools, but your sayin' so don't make it so, and Jesus Christ won't make it so, neither.

"We're poor, I know; God knows, pitifully poor, but we ain't so poor as Him as was born in a manger. There you go again, laughing at us. We're a show for you swell folks, we are—and no doubt you think we've got no right to be—bein as you've got the title deed to the earth and every livin' thing on it that money and position and blue blood can buy—but we don't envy you, dear ladies and gentlemen—indeed we don't, and we've only come here tonight to tell you that there's hope for you—hope even for New York's 400, if they but know it and come in time to be saved. You may think you're the whole show now, but you ain't. Why, the Lord Almighty has only got to snap His little finger and out you go. Now please stop laughin' long enough to hear Captain Fanny sing that ever precious little Army song, 'There'll be no night there.'" And she sang it in a way, too, that would have done credit to the most high-salaried New York choir.

I couldn't help being moved, and I noticed that there was a gentleman in front of me who broke right down and cried.

"Don't make an ass of yourself, you fool you, don't you see you are mortifying me to death?"

It was the man's wife, who was bending wickedly over him. A shudder ran over me, and I wondered if a woman could be respectable and talk like that. I asked Mrs. Snow about it.

"Undoubtedly," said Mrs. Snow, "they belong to the Four Hundred because you know I have always heard"—this very emphatically—"that the Four Hundred could do pretty nearly everything and still be respectable."

Next day the Colonel asked me to go driving. I went. He said he was fond of widows. I told him Can wasn't. Then he asked me if I wouldn't please stop talking about Can. I did. It will never do to cross a man—never, especially, now, if you like him, and I did like the Colonel immensely. That wasn't the only drive. We went nearly every single day—if not on the beach it was over at San Diego. Then again we would go out to La Jolla. La Jolla, you know, is where they have the rocks and gorgeous scenery. Oh, but the caves there are beautiful—too beautiful for anything. I asked the Colonel the last time we went there if he didn't think so, too. He said he wasn't thinking about caves. I didn't ask him what he was thinkin' about about, but he came right out, sir, and told me right there in the boat, with the waves a jostlin' me like a miserable little lifeless cork. Nervous? I was really hysterical and I couldn't help thinking about that dear young couple who never did get out of La Jolla with their lives when they stayed too long in the cave and the high tide came and swallowed them up.

"Darn the tide," said the Colonel. He didn't care a rap what happened—he was going to tell me what he thought of me if every breaker on the Pacific dashed over him.

"My goodness me, Colonel," I replied amusedly, "you're getting sentimental."

"Look here, little widow," he exclaimed excitedly, "don't trifle with me any longer. If you don't love me, say so; but if you do love me, for God's sake let me take Canfield's place."

Just to think, now, of a newspaper man flying all to pieces like that. Why, I always thought an editor was nothing in the world but "copy," and that there wasn't any room for flesh and blood and passion.

Dear me, dear me—and what did I say? Well, if it had been at Holden, now, I don't know what I'd a said, really I don't—but it wasn't. The Colonel seemed satisfied with my answer. B. L. R.

Everything Comes to Him who Waits

A persistent Social Aspirant, after repeated Rebuffs, had almost decided to give up the Hopeless Quest after Society Honors when she made the Acquaintance of an Ex-Cotillon Leader, to whom she confided her Troubles.

"Oh, that is Quite Easy," said he when she had poured all her Woful Past into his Ears, "all you must do is to become a Charity Worker. The first thing to be done is to Subscribe to all the Smart Charitable Societies."

So the Social Aspirant plunked down several big Gold Pieces and already saw herself on the Top Wave of the Swim. But the Directresses of the Smart Charitable Societies took the money Eagerly and thanked the donor Effusively, but when they met her in the street the next day, they were all very Near Sighted and failed to Recognize her.

Again went the lady to her Adviser, and she Rai'ed Bitterly at the Loss of her Money and Failure to attain her Object.

"Never give up," said the Ex-Cotillon leader, "never say die. Keep at the Charity Racket and in time you'll Win."

By his advice the Social Aspirant gave a large Minstrel Show for the benefit of one of the Smart Charitable Societies. The directresses came to the Function and were very Gracious to the Hostess. But their recognition of her later never progressed beyond a Cold Bow.

Again irate, the lady sought her Adviser.

"Be happy," said he; "from the Icy Stare you have entered the Cold Bow period. It will not be long before you penetrate the Holy of Holies."

Therefore was the lady encouraged in her Charitable Endeavors. She gave away More money and projected other Entertainments, of which she shouldered the Expenses and gave all the Receipts to a Charitable Object. She was just basking in the Delight of a High Hand Shake from a Woman of Prominence when she fell Ill and Died.

Her funeral was attended by Society in a Body.

"And what a pity," said the Ex-Cotillon Leader, who was among the Mourners, "that the Dear Deported cannot be here to see the Tears shed upon her Casket by the Leaders of the Ton. Her desire is at last Realized, if a trifle Late. She has attained Social Recognition." —The Undertaker.

STAGE

Scenery Not Shakespeare

It is a good many years ago that I saw "Henry VIII" at the California theatre, with Frederick Warde and Mrs. Bowers in the characters portrayed by Louis James and Modjeska in the Columbia presentation of the play. As I remember it, the former was a much better production than the latter. It was not lavishly mounted, there were fewer supernumeraries, and some of the scenes were left out entirely. But the cast as a whole was satisfactory, and read its Shakespeare with intelligence. Now Messrs. Wagenhals and Kemper have given us a great scenic "Henry VIII." No part of the mountings is slighted. It is such a stage production as might satisfy Irving, the most exacting stage manager in the world. Alas! in bestowing so much attention upon the play's mountings the selection of a cast to match the scenery was overlooked. I should imagine that a bargain counter lot of actors was obtained at the last moment, chosen as they select choruses for a comic opera, for their figures. There are some shapely legs in the "Henry VIII" cast, and as the men are well set up and muscular the women are one and all pretty and graceful.

The Twin Stars

Madame Modjeska is a beautiful, patrician Queen. She never lapses from her regal bearing; never does the deposed Katherine lose her dignity. In the trial scene, the Queen's noble attitude is its own rebuke to those who would belittle her. This same nobility enshrouds her death scene. Never is Modjeska's grief noisy or violent. She is always a Queen. James' Wolsey is an admirable interpretation, scholarly and well rounded. There is no one else in the cast who can in any way approach the stars. Except in Aphie James' Anne Bullen and three or four other roles, intelligent interpretation is lacking. The King himself is a farce; Norman Hackett is impossible.

Miss Seligman's Farewell

The engagement of Minnie Seligman at the Grand has been all too short. There are many plays in her repertory that one would like to see, but during this brief season it was impossible to produce them. I do not wonder that Miss Seligman is such a favorite in New York. She is not only an actress of talent and culture, but is a charming and womanly woman. This beautiful feminine quality was never shown more clearly than in Gilbert's "Comedy and Tragedy" that opened this week's bill, Miss Seligman playing Clarice. Then in the latter part of the program "Cavalleria Rusticana," she shows her strong capacity for heavy dramatic work. Even Calve's Santuzza did not thrill the audience to a greater extent than does Miss Seligman's. Her curse scene at the church door is one of the most convincing bits of acting I have ever seen.

From Farce to Emotion

It was a big jump from "Charley's Aunt" to "The Wife" and it increases my respect for the Alcazar stock that the spring was so well taken. "The Wife" is a pretty play. While some of its situations, after the modern mode of looking at social sins and follies, are unnecessary and therefore almost absurd, the play is still one of the best that David Belasco ever had a hand in. The company is well balanced. Mr. Alsop is not unlike Herbert Kelcey in his portrayal of the Senator. Rutherford is somewhat of a prig, anyway, and one cannot blame the actor because the author refuses to let him unbend. Mr. Scott makes an admirable villain whether in melodrama or emotional plays; his Culver is a strong bit of work. Mr. Shumer's best work as Robert Gray, victim of others' deceit, is done in the second act. He is a very manly figure. Mr. Osbourne has little to do as the produce exchange man but emit an occasional hearty laugh, but his comedy and that laugh are irresistible. Mr. Bacon is in his proper element as the faint-hearted Major. He has some delightful scenes with Miss Crosby. Mr. Tracy, the Jack Dexter of the cast, is a bright juvenile actor and makes a clever double for little Oza Waldrop (Kitty Ives). Miss Wycherly's emotional work as the passionate, revengeful Creole is far above that of Miss Convere in the title part. The latter's forte is not emotion. Rather is she a refined and delicate comedienne. I should like to see her in the Daly comedies and in "Mr. Wilkinson's Widows," "The Senator" and plays of that ilk. As Helen in "The Wife" she makes a lovely picture, but her acting does not carry conviction with it. She is artificial. Miss Wycherly's Lucile, on the contrary, is instinct with life. She interests from the start. Miss Crosby is to the manner born as Mrs. Bellamy Ives, and does some charming comedy work. Miss Howe fits well into her role of Mrs. Amery. Miss Wakeman and Mr. Gerson are efficient as maid and private secretary. The play is beautifully mounted, the library scene being especially handsome. All the women wear smart frocks. On Monday night each player as she or he appeared was received with applause, extra enthusiasm greeting George Osbourne's return and the entrance of Frank Bacon, who is a prime favorite with the theatre's patrons.

Why Mrs. Pat went on the Stage

My London correspondent writes me that Mrs. "Pat" Campbell, who is now paying her first visit to "the States," is about thirty-six years of age. She is of mixed parentage, her mother having been an Italian while her father was English. Born in England, nearly all her life has been spent in

M. of said day.

Dated December 27th, 1901.

BY ORDER OF THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

ATTEST.
J. E. LARSON, President. J. J. BURKE, Secretary.

DIVIDEND NOTICE

CALIFORNIA SAFE DEPOSIT AND TRUST COMPANY, corner California and Montgomery Sts. For the six months ending December 31st, 1901, dividends have been declared on Deposits in the Savings Department of this Company as follows: On Term Deposits, at the rate of 3 6-10 per cent per annum, and on Ordinary Deposits, at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, free of taxes, and payable on and after Thursday, January 2, 1902. Dividends uncalled for are added to the principal and bear the same rate of dividend as the principal from and after January 1, 1902. J. DALZELL BROWN, Manager.

London, with the exception of the period when she was touring the provinces and a year she spent in Paris to perfect herself in French. She was only a "talented amateur" when fate made of her a professional. Her husband, a Scotchman, with an Irish Christian name, and a gallant officer in the army, was obliged to go abroad with his regiment. As he was absent from his beautiful wife about seven years she became lonesome and as she loved to work and especially to act, she joined the "Bachelor" company in Liverpool, later becoming a member of Mrs. Bandmann-Palmer's and then of Mr. Ben Greet's company. It was not until 1890 that she appeared in a London theatre, and not until 1895 that she found herself, by virtue of her charming Juliet, a reigning star. She played in "As You Like It" in the memorable performance given at Wilton, the country-seat of Earl and Countess Pembroke. The production was later repeated at Ashridge before Earl and Countess Brownlow. Brownlow said at the time he considered her Rosalind the best he had even seen, even superior to Ada Rehan's.

Her Skirt Fell Off

One night when Mrs. Pat Campbell appeared in "The Trumpet Call," in her part of Astrea, the gipsy, an incident occurred that served to show her great self-command. Through her dresser's carelessness, the short black skirt, thin to imitate rags and covering very scanty underwear, fell below her knees before she noticed it was unfastened. Though some of the audience forgot their breeding and began to laugh. Mrs. Pat was not feazed. She gathered up her skirt without losing her self-possession, was off the stage and back again so quickly as scarcely to disturb the play's action and went on as if nothing had happened.

Her "Discovery" by Pinero

It was in Pinero's "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" and "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith" that she attained her highest London vogue. And the way Mrs. Campbell came to play in Pinero's dramas is of some interest. She was acting Clarice Berton in "Black Domino" and Pinero saw her in the death scene of that play. Her emotional power impressed him and he asked her to create Paula in his new play. After that the playwright would have no one else to create leading roles in his new plays.

Modjeska and the Dramatic Aspirant

Madame Modjeska has not been so troubled with applications from stage-struck girls as have some stars, for Count Bozenta always took pains to keep these annoyances from her. However, she tells one story of an encounter she could not escape. It was a few years ago when she was crossing the continent, and as the train was delayed for some time at a little station the passengers alighted. Modjeska was sitting on a pile of lumber. All at once she was approached by an overgrown girl with a thin, pale face and wearing black glasses. She asked if that were Madame Modjeska and without waiting for an answer went on: "I am determined to go on the stage. Even if you say I have no talent I am going just the same, but I want to know if you think I have the capacity to act. I must act. My family will not listen to it, but I am determined to go on the stage. Do you think I am fitted for it?" She said all this without a stop and then Modjeska had to tell her that as she had never seen her before, did not know her name, and could scarcely ask her to recite there in the open while the train waited, she feared her opinion would be useless. The girl gave one hopeless farewell stare and then vanished as mysteriously as she had appeared.

A Priceless Mouchoir

The handkerchief Modjeska carries in "Henry VIII" is one of the rarest pieces of old Spanish lace in the world. It is believed to have once been the property of Queen Isabella. Modjeska was asked to exhibit it at the World's Fair in Chicago among other relics of the Columbian era. The great actress has a wardrobe that is full of beautiful garments. She has preserved her fine figure all these years, and yet she never wears corsets. Instead she wears a tightly fitted buckskin bodice, which comes up to the armpits and over the hips. This was her own invention, an idea gained from wearing the buckskin tunic as Rosalind in "As You Like It." Modjeska was asked the other day whom she considered the most beautiful woman, and she answered that she had always thought Lily Langtry an ideal beauty. By the way, just now, Modjeska is a very sick woman. She has remarkable will power, otherwise she would not be able to act at all.

Russo's Christmas gift to Collamarini was an eight hundred dollar diamond.

At the egg-nog parties now all the vogue in society Chapin & Gore's whiskies are the brand used.

Rostand a Fallen Idol

When Rostand was at the zenith of his popularity a critic remarked: "In respect to dramatic situations, I think Dumas the elder had a considerable advantage over you."

"Yes," replied Rostrand, "there is no doubt about it, but that is insignificant compared to another advantage which he possesses."

"What is that, monsieur?"

"Why, all his contemporary critics are dead."

The story, whether true or ben trovato, loses nothing in point, for at the present timeRostand is a fallen idol, and the critics are asking whether he is a poet at all, and whether he can even write French, and any number of other impertinent and far-fetched questions. The people whose business or pleasure it is to talk and write about what others do have taken offense at the poems of M. Rostrand in praise of the Czarina, and they are unwilling to grant that he possesses any merit at all. It would be well to consider whether these effusions are not, to some extent, official, and to be looked upon as the perfunctory work of a poet laureate. At all events, it is rather early to reverse judgment, and that for a whim which concerns politics rather than literature.

Attractions Next Week

Next week at the Columbia Modjeska and James will appear in repertory: Monday and Saturday nights "Macbeth"; Tuesday night and Saturday matinee, "Mary Stuart," by many considered Modjeska's greatest role; Wednesday and Friday nights, "Merchant of Venice"; Thursday night, "Henry VIII." Among forthcoming attractions at the Columbia are "Princess Chic" with Tommy Leary as one of the comedians; Viola Allen in "The Palace of the King"; Margaret Anglin, Henry Miller and other stars in new plays.

The Grand Opera House stock will next week produce "Claire and the Forgemaster," one of the most popular dramas in the famous Kendalls' repertory. Laura Nelson Hall will be Claire and Herschel Mayall will be Philippe Derblay. Fred Butler will be Monsieur Bachlieu. The play will be finely staged. Several interesting works will shortly be presented at the Grand.

The Alcazar's play for next week is absolutely new here. "For the White Rose" is a romantic drama, scenes laid in Sherwood forest, England, during the Thirty Years' War, and the leading male part was written especially for M. L. Alsop. E. H. Sothern owns the Eastern rights to the play's production and Mr. Alsop those of the West. The hero is a dashing, chivalrous young Irishman and Mr. Alsop should revel in the rollicking scenes in which Larry Kavanagh is made to appear. New scenery has been painted for the production and the costumes will be rich and picturesque.

George Cooper's swim is the sensation in "Lost in New York" at the Central this week. Next week's bill will be quite as exciting as this—that old favorite, "Under the Gaslight," one of Augustin Daly's early works. Peachblossom, Snorkey, Byke, old Judas and the rest: do we not remember them all with pleasure? The railroad scene is unparalleled in melodrama.

Kara, the wonderful juggler who excels all others in his line, will be one of the Orpheum's stars next week. Three new arrivals from Australia, the Faust sisters, will do a charming and novel dance. Arthur Buckner, bicycle soloist, will do some startling turns. Jacques Inaudi will repeat his tremendous mental feats. Eddie Girard, the nimble-footed, and his clever partner Florence Gardner, will give new specialties. The musical Westons, Alf Holt the whistler, and the Gardner Cranes in "A Happy Pair" will be on the program.

Anna Wilson will have a new song for the part of the fairy queen in "Little Red Riding Hood" at the Tivoli next week, a good song which she sings well. Hartman will give "I'm Tired" and "Mister Shakespeare" for the last times, as next will be the final week of the spectacle. Frank Daniels' last comic opera hit, "The Ameer," will be given its first production by the Tivoli company on January twentieth. Several new singers will be heard in the comic opera.

—The Playgoer.

Jerome Hart's book of travel sketches, "Argonaut Letters," which was published early in the year, is now entirely out of print, and no more copies can be supplied. It was printed from type form, so that a new edition is out of the question.

MUSIC

A Sacramento Girl's Success

Alice Kellar, last year supporting May Irwin's vocal numbers with her banjo playing, is this year with Rice's company and is said to be making a great hit. Miss Irwin according to report is extremely particular and hard to suit but she fairly showered Miss Kellar with compliments on her work. Miss Kellar is a Sacramento girl, one time music pupil of Gertrude Gerrish, the pianiste of that place. After leaving Sacramento Miss Kellar studied vocal music under the best teachers wherever she was touring and in the great international banjo contest several years ago won the championship. Her playing of this instrument is said to be wonderful, besides which she has a beautiful contralto voice, is a splendid actress and possessed of a handsome figure and face of the Maxine Elliot type.

He Played at His Own Time

There is one thing that Josef Hofman, the youthful piano virtuoso, now paying a visit to the coast, does not like about the California winter. There is no ice here and he is passionately fond of skating. A story is extant about Josef that shows, in connection with this passion, the youth's independent disposition. It happened about two years ago that Josef was in St. Petersburg, and one day the ex-Empress of Russia sent for him to come and play for her. Such a desire of course was a command, and it was accompanied by the words, "Come between three and four o'clock." Now, the day was beautiful, bright and clear, and the Neva was in charming condition for skaters. Josef had his lunch and then went to his room where his father found him dressing in his court attire. Asked where he was going, Josef answered, "To play for the Empress." His father remonstrated, because the hour named for him to go to court was three o'clock. But Josef replied, "I will not wait till three, for if I do it will be too late to skate. I shall go now!" It turned out that the ex-Empress was not angry because Josef came before the appointed hour. He played for her and then went off to the Neva with his skates.

The Last Symphony

The third and last of the first series of symphony concerts under the auspices of the San Francisco Symphony Society will take place at the Grand Opera House next Friday afternoon. Director Steindorff has proved satisfactory and his orchestra of fifty-five musicians, with Giulio Minetti as concert-meister, is one of which San Francisco may justly feel proud. In selecting his final program Mr. Steindorff has shown rare judgment, a more attractive offering being hard to find. It is: Donna Diana, overture (first time) E. von Reznicsk; Traume (Dreams), E. Wagner, (arranged for orchestra by Johan Svendsen); Scenes Pittoresque, J. Massenet; symphony (Jupiter), C major, W. A. Mozart. The Mozart opera "Le Nozze de Figaro" was the sensation of the Grau grand opera season, and study of Mozart's works was consequently entered into with renewed zeal by music students. This production of a Mozart symphony will doubtless attract all those who enjoyed the opera. Reserved seats will be ready at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s next Tuesday morning at nine o'clock, prices ranging from a dollar and a half to fifty cents.

A concert to be given by four Tivoli grand opera stars in Oakland next Tuesday is attracting no little interest on the other side of the bay, as the singers are great favorites. The quartet is made up of Repetto, soprano, Collamarini, contralto, Russo, tenor, and Ferrari, baritone. Andre Benoist, a Paris Conservatoire graduate, is the accompanist and the program will embrace favorite operatic numbers in which the several vocalists have done especially good work. Benoist, by the way, is a young Parisian of only twenty-two years of age but already a master of the keyboard. He graduated from the Conservatoire at sixteen, subsequently studying with those renowned masters, Massenet, Godard, Saint Saens and Thome. The opera company recently appeared in Los Angeles and received great praise from the critics. Prominent society people of Oakland have the concert in charge. The company is on its way East.

On the opening night of the photographic salon at the Hopkins, from eight to eleven there was a promenade concert under the direction of Sir Henry Heyman when the orchestra rendered the following well selected program: March, Adelman; overture, "Stradella," Flotow; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; intermezzo, "Anna" (new), Krouse; selections from "Romeo and Juliet," Gounod; gavotte, "Princess," Czibulda; valse Espagnole, "Chiquita" (new), Liefeld; Magnolia Serenade, Missud; selections, "The Governor's Son" (new), Cohan; Berceuse, Cruell's; Popular Melody, Wilson; march, "Spirit of Liberty," Sousa. On the evenings of January sixteenth and twenty-third there will be vocal and instrumental concerts under the direction of Henry Heyman.

Nordica's Advice

Lilian Nordica in that article now going the rounds of the Supps, gives some very practical advice to American girls in particular and all girls in general who are studying vocal music with the operatic stage in view. She says so many ambitious young singers throw the responsibility of their selection of a career upon her shoulders and entreat her to choose for them. "I receive letters," she says, "and the girls come to see me, poor things, and expect me to tell them whether they can't be great singers, too. How can I take the responsibility? Am I to order their lives? All I can do is to give them good advice and answer their poor letters. Do they know what success means—what trouble, what work, what disappointment, what sheer physical endurance? Why, the first act of 'Lohengrin' requires one to stand on the stage one whole hour. Many opera acts require one hour and a half. How many women can go through just that? Girls are so romantic and have such ideas. They are ignorant of life and wish to jump into glory. What makes a singer? Application and concentration, they are two requisites. I have sacrificed everything, my pleasures and caprices as well as my time and my life. But study masters. Even a voice will not suffice. The only infallible authority is the public. It is never wrong, not in the long run."

Mr. Emlyn Lewys, B.A., and Miss Mary Carrington, pianiste, are to give six lecture recitals in the Knabe parlor of Kohler & Chase's on Thursday afternoons at 3:30 from January ninth to February thirteenth. They are invitational and as Mr. Lewys is an authority on the subject of piano technique the lectures and their demonstration promise to be most interesting as well as instructive.

This evening the fourth concert of the season will be given by the Minetti quartet in Y. M. C. A. Auditorium. The quartet will be assisted by Frederic Biggerstaff, pianist. The program announces a string quartet in D minor by Bazzini, a Rubinstein piano and cello sonata in D major, and a Schubert string quartet in D minor.

Friday evening, January twenty-fourth, an orchestral and violin recital will be given in Oakland under the direction of Alexander Stewart. There will be thirty-five musicians in the orchestra, twenty-five of whom will be violin players. William King will assist at the organ and Miss Beulah George is to give some vocal numbers.

A New Composition

I had the pleasure of receiving and reading Samuel Bollinger's "Danza Melancholique" which proves to be quite as original and interesting as his other published compositions. The Danza is characteristic of its title and has a thread of peculiarly pleasing melody woven into harmonies of delightful conception. Mr. Bollinger has several interesting and ambitious compositions yet in manuscript which will probably ere long be given to the public.

Here and There

Elizabeth Westgate, pianiste, and Alexander Stewart, violinist, announce the first of this year's musicales at the residence of the former, 117 Paru street, Alameda, for this afternoon, in which there will be numbers rendered by Miss Westgate and Mr. Stewart for violin and piano and vocal numbers by Miss Grace Carroll the contralto. These musicales are but a continuation of former events of the kind and Miss Westgate is a delightful hostess in addition to her other accomplishments. In addition to these attractions the music itself is of a very high order and one can but look forward with liveliest anticipation to the event, remembering last year's enjoyment under similar conditions. The program is selected from Mozart, Max Bruch, Grieg, Schubert, Draeseke, Massenet, Glazounow and Mlynarski.

The first foreign star to visit us this year will be Josef Hofmann, who will be at the Columbia on January twenty-eigth and thirty-first. —The Music Critic.

Ready Made Men

A few years ago the average man would have regarded it as an impossibility for him to wear anything but clothes built to order for him by a high-priced custom tailor. He bought perhaps two suits a year and they were all he could afford. In this jeune siecle, all the is changed. There is no necessity nowadays for any man to go about looking seedy or shabby. There is no necessity for any man to deprive himself of the pleasures of society for lack of an evening suit. J. J. Gildea, the dispensers of good clothes at 756-758 Market street, can fit the most exacting figure and taste in clothes. Their ready-to-wear clothing is not of ordinary cut; it has that indispensable something we call "style" or "tone." And though it shows the custom tailor's touch, it is far below the custom tailor's price. Mr. Gildea makes a specialty of evening clothes.

Sunset for January has a most entertaining contents. A beautifully illustrated poem is "Roses of Monterey," by E. C. Tompkins. "The Sequoia's Death," by Dr. Babad, is illustrated from photographs taken in the Mariposa Grove. Guaymas is described in two articles. Alla Aldrich Clarke, H. L. Wells, T. S. Van Dyke, Jessie J. Knox and others contribute entertaining articles. The half tones are admirable throughout the number.

The Pasmore concert, which was announced for Tuesday, January fourteenth, has been changed to Tuesday, January twenty-first, one week later.

A New Branch of Labor

The new School of Copper-plate, and Card Engraving and Designing established by F. W. Gardam offers a splendid field for ambitious young Californians desiring to enter some business or profession whose ranks are not already over-crowded. Mr. Gardam was formerly with Tiffany & Co., New York, Payot Upham & Co., and lately with Lowman & Hanford of Seattle. The scarcity of competent artists and engravers on copper and steel caused Mr. Gardam to conceive the idea of founding this school. There is no more lucrative craft or profession, for Mr. Gardam himself has never accepted less than two hundred and fifty dollars per month, his services being in great demand at that figure. From seventy-five to one hundred dollars is the average monthly pay, though in many cases it reaches one hundred and fifty and two hundred dollars. For a moderate compensation Mr. Gardam now offers in his School of Engraving and Designing the opportunity of acquiring a degree of skill in these branches.

Its Purity is Unquestioned

"A little whisky for the stomach's sake" is good advice, but one must be sure that the whisky's purity is beyond dispute else the stomach will not benefit by the drink. Argonaut "O. K." whisky, of which E. Martin & Co., 54-56 First street, are the proprietors, is an absolutely pure whisky and therefore always safe to use.

No Wines, but Pure Foods

Some restaurants attract patronage by giving cheap claret or white wine with a small orde to gloss over a poor bill of fare. This is not the case with the Puritan Dining Room, 413 Market street. While there are no wines served, the menu and service are perfect.

What is a Boom Novel?

If one were called upon to characterize the style and standing of literature at the present time, one would be obliged to call it the period of the boom novel, and of boom novels there are two classes. One is what some one has aptly termed "The Old Homestead" style and the other is the historical. They are what might be called good "library" novels, since they suit the taste and intellectual capacity of the people who do not care to own books but are satisfied to depend upon the public libraries for their mental food. The "Old Homestead" novel, like the play of that name, deals with homely scenes and pastoral people and the central figure is some elderly man or woman around whom the events cluster. The historical novel can be anything under the sun, and can be timed to any period from the earliest recorded history to the last great war. There is only one requirement—plenty of fighting as a background for a love story. Incidentally the great names of the period are introduced, and some effort is made to keep within hailing distance of recorded facts, but the main thing is plenty of gore, a wilful maid and an adventurous swain, and all the better if the lovers are in opposition in their sympathies. Of the "Old Homestead" variety, "Eben Holden," "Quincy Adams Sawyer" and "The Road to Ridgeby's" are amongst the best examples, and they are not bad. They have a human interest and sympathy which are apt to be lacking in the stuffed military figures which stalk through the war books. They please the older generation, who can still recall the days of candles, when the sewing machine was a luxury and the bread was baked in the family oven. Style and literary finish are not factors in their popularity, and the homely humor expressed in homely language makes an appeal where polished wit would fail. Why or how the historical romance took such a foothold no one now could say. There is little to commend itself in the majority of them, and those dealing with any particular period are as much alike as mill-made clothespins. To read one is to have read all. Yet, strange to say, people who fall under the fascination, will laboriously work their way through the pile, just as theatre-goers will make a point of going to every performance of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," for the sake of seeing all the Topsies, or follow up "East Lynne," or, more rarely, one of Shakespeare's plays. "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker," was one of the first, and decidedly the best of the Revolutionary novels, but it received comparatively little attention, though it perhaps paved the way for the phenomenal success of its followers. "Janice Meredith," "Richard Carvel," "Philip Winwood," and a host more followed close on its heels, and for years past the interest in American history, judging it from the fictional standpoint, has been phenomenal. Irving Bacheller has succeeded in claiming attention in both the "Old Homestead" and the historical schools, and indeed his "D'ri and I" is a combination of both. In the latter he has been astute enough to desert the overworked fields of the Revolution, and to leave New York and Philadelphia for the Canadian border and the Second War for Independence. Charles Felton Pidgin has also courted honors in both fields, and his second book ignored war as an active factor of interest. "Blennerhassett" took a new hero in the person of Aaron Burr. Mary Hartwell Catherwood, who was one of the first to enter the field of history in search for material for romance, and whose earlier stories stray into the little known by-paths of colonial days, has also taken a new theme in her "Lazarre," the supposed Dauphin, but apart from Mr. Pidgin and Mrs. Catherwood, there is little of novelty in theme or treatment, in the Colonial and Revolutionary novels. In "The Crisis," as in "The Cavalier," Mr. Cable's new book, the Civil war is the background, but Mr. Cable makes the war a secondary consideration, and makes no attempt to cover the whole field. Hamlin Garland transplanted his western miner into English high society in his story of "Her Mountain Lover," but it was hardly a success, and Jim may be buried in a cave in his Colorado mine for all the interest the public has shown in him. By far the strongest book of the year just ended, from an American pen, was "The Octopus," by Frank Norris. It attracted as much attention in England as in America, and quite recently a London editor did it the questionable honor of discovering in it a motive for the assassination of President McKinley. Of the books which possess a quieter and more domestic interest there has been nothing so good as Dr. S. Weir Mitchell's "Circumstance." Reminiscences of the war with Spain, and war books, apart from fiction, have been plentiful during the last few years. There have been so many that even the best have been perforce neglected. Captain Robley E. Evans "Sailor's Log," though not a war book, lost nothing in popularity from the fact that most people knew nothing of him before the Spanish war.

The English Writers

Though the American second-rate novel outranks the British second-rater, the fact remains that the best English writers are quite as far in advance of the best American story-tellers. It is to England that we owe the flood of Letters and Garden Literature which threatened for a time to oust even the historical romances from the field. Thomas Hardy has been silent, but in his place, and a worthy rival, comes Eden Phillpotts, whose "Good Red Earth" and "The Striking Hours" have been his contributions for the year. Kipling's "Kim," which gained nothing from its publication serially in McClure's, is decidedly one of the books of the year, though it will prove a disappointment to readers in search of the flirtatious matron and the impecunious subaltern. Zach has given us two powerful, if not altogether pleasant, books in "The White Cottage," and "Tales of Dunstable Weir," and the same judgment will apply to Lucas Malet's new book, "Sir Richard Calmady." Both Hall Caine and Marie Corelli are represented by religious novels, and though Miss Corelli's book was not an issue of the year 1901, its popularity amongst her admirers has been such that it is, to all intents and purposes, a book of the hour. Gilbert Parker's "Right of Way" is another of the books now demanding public attention, and "The Secret Orchard" by the Castles, Agnes and Egerton, which has a decidedly French flavor as well as setting, is also attracting attention. "Jack Raymond," which has been the only contribution of Mrs. Voynich since her powerful novel, "The Gadfly," is another book not to be lightly passed over. But to mention only by name a tithe of the novels in English alone which have attracted attention would be almost a task for Hercules. In the way of translations nothing else has received so much notice as "Foma Gordyeeff," the work of the Russian peasant Maxim Gorky. It was expected that a new and unexpurgated edition of the "Journal of Marie Bashkirtseff," that precocious young Russian artist who died some years ago, and whose intimate confidences with herself, so evidently written with an eye to the public, would create something of the same furore that the originally journal enjoyed, but the public had forgotten Marie Bashkirtseff, and the "Love Letter" craze had sated the public appetite. Another book from which much was expected and little more than disappointment gathered was "Five Years of My Life," by Alfred Dreyfus. In fact, there sems to have seen but little interest in biography and autobiography, and those thrifty publishers who rushed lives of Queen Victoria through the presses were lucky if they came out even. It is impossible at the present time, if it is ever otherwise, to forecast the trend of popular taste in the matter of books, during the present year, and it little matters how the critic may carp at the lack of culture amongst the masses, for it is the judgment of the masses which will determine the output. Dollars are a tangible argument, and both authors and publishers have a canny eye to what will sell best. Even those who prate most loudly of "art for art's sake" must acknowledge the necessity of keeping alive if they would produce anything, and unless they have an assured maintenance they will be found quite reconciled to making money first and devoting themselves to art afterwards. —The Bookworm.

SAN FRANCISCO, DEC. 24, 1900.

DR. WONG WOO,

To all whom it may concern: In December, 1899, I was taken sick with Black Typhoid Fever, the most virulent type known to medical science. I had hemorrhages both nasal and intestinal, eight of the latter occurring in one day. Dr. Wong Woo, eminent Chinese physician, who called and with one dose of his tea stopped the flow of blood, thereby saving my life, as I had been given up by my white physician, as well as by all my friends. Was unconscious four weeks, but by Dr. Wong Woo's wonderful skill he saved my life from this most fatal of all fevers. Although I was confined to my bed three months, was able to resume my vocation in six months from the time I went to bed, and now I weigh 202 pounds, more than I ever attained previously. I would cheerfully recommend Dr. Wong Woo to any one in need of a first-class physician for any cause whatsoever.

THE SOUL'S DESIRE.

After a course of Sappho, Horace and Anacreon

There is no poetry in our cold religion,
That chills the blood with cruel austerities.
Give me the warm, love-kindling, happy Grecian
Religion, with its myriad gods and goddesses,
The dear religion of a summer climate
Where gambol nymphs so classic, nude and lovely,
Who live yet in the love-lays of Olympus!
Peace to the heart is given by those paeans,
And stir the soul, the sayings of Jupiter—
Mighty Jove!

A QUESTION OF NECESSITY.

"I shall never marry," said the bachelor girl, "but live my life in single blessedness."

"And what is the reason of this vow?" asked the matron, observing that the bachelor girl was still youthful and comely.

"Because none of the men I know have asked me," was the answer, "and I see no signs of their proposing." The Chaperon.

I wonder if I could brace up and follow the example of my old chum? Lord! I never thought Tom would be caught—but an heiress is a pretty good thing these hard days. Now I wonder—there's that little school girl I've been making love to off and on for the past year. She's too easy, though, and her father's willing. I like a game with more go to it. But then there's the girl and the dot—and on the other side a future in which debt accumulates mountains high. I'm still owing for Flossie's sealskin, and that diamond garter she would insist on buying for her Christmas gift. Miss Clare's dot would be a very nice salve for the wound my next month's income received in that purchase. But—given Clare, what's to become of Flossie? I hate scandal and she's just the kind to make a fuss. Well, let me toss up for it—heads, Flossie; tails, Clare. Tails it is! Well, good-bye, Flossie. Now, what the devil—well, I'll propose to Clare first. Then, come the deluge.

Hers

It's coming. I feel it in my poor shaky bones. And I guess I'll have to say yes. He loves me, and after all 'tis worth something to have a man love one and not one's millions. Besides, I'll have to break off that little affair with ——, now that his wife has begun to sit up and take notice. He has no idea I m anything but ingenue. Fancy if he ever heard! But my old dear doesn't move in the same set. 'Twill be hard to give up his dear society, but I've been going a little too fast; if I don't pull up there's sure to be a sensation. I am between Scylla and Charybdis—if I marry, there's the one love of my life ready to turn off the gas. If I don't accept papa's choice, there's a nice young man loaded with suicide thoughts. Heigho! what shall I do?

III.

The Other One's

He bores me to death lately, goes mooning around and staring at me as if he couldn't get enough of my face. If anything I hate, 'tis a moonstruck lover. And he's getting stingy, too; grumbled awfully when I ordered a diamond garter the other day and sent the bill to his office. I wonder how I could throw him off without hurting his feelings? He's not a bad sort, and I liked him well enough at first. But—well, there's ——. To be sure, he's old and not good-looking, but then his bank account is very solid. I'm not so young as I was and must begin and lay by for a rainy day. But—oh, I'd hate to be the heroine of a scandal, and if I gave Him his conge, I fear he'd go and drown himself. I don't know what to do—yes, I have it! the first that comes to my house tomorrow shall be my choice for the year!

SUMMONS IN DIVORCE

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Department No. 5

FLORENCE G. TILTON, Plaintiff
vs
CHARLES O. TILTON, Defendant

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of sa'd Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:
CHARLES O. TILTON, Defendant

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of defendant's wilful neglect and wilful desertion of plaintiff also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 30th day of October in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and one.

It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public Mr. George Mayerle of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I consulted Mr. George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction.

OUR OPINION

The Fool Minister Again

How unfortunate that it is not as difficult for a preacher to get into print as it is for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle! If it were then we should be spared many unpleasant spectacles. We should not have occasion to marvel so often that men of small minds find it so easy to get into the ministry. There are no doubt quite as many silly yawpers in other professions as in the ministry, but the newspapers do not give them access to their columns. Therefore they are not on exhibition. They enjoy the blessing of merciful obscurity. But let a preacher, be he ever so shallow-pated, seek publicity through the medium of the press, even though his only purpose be to make the angels weep, he is promptly extended the glad hand. The latest victim of journalistic encouragement is the Rev. Dr. Charles Wilbur de Lyon Nichols of Nichols, Conn. Instead of confining himself to the field of endeavor to which he is presumed to be fitted, he has undertaken, the despatches tell us, to determine what persons might properly be considered to be in fashionable society in all the large cities of this country. Why Nichols of Nichols should consider himself qualified to solve such an unimportant but intricate problem, not the slightest hint is given. His name is suggestive of a long line of mixed ancestry. Perhaps he is the bluest blooded chap in all Nichols, and is anxious to impress the simple folks of that obscure village with the wealth of his knowledge on the subject of fashionable society. But whatever his purpose it is evident that he has not neglected his Bible to study the society columns to advantage. His list of San Francisco people who are entitled to be in fashionable society is sufficient to expose his unfamiliarity with the subject. The only names on the list are those of Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mr. and Mrs. George Crocker and Mr. and Mrs. John W. Mackay. As Mr. Tevis is dead it is evident that the Rev. Nichols does not hesitate to fix the social standards even on the other side. As for Mr. and Mrs. George Crocker they have been making the battle for social recognition for many years, and even now their position is not quite settled. Mr. and Mrs. Mackay have long since been admitted to the holy of holies abroad, but there are people in San Francisco who mingled in the fashionable throng years before Mrs. Mackay conquered London. The dope book of the Rev. Nichols is in need of amendment.

The Cost of Ignorance

From recently published reports on the subject of the Spanish war it appears that there is urgent need of instruction at West Point in sanitation and hygiene. The glory achieved by our arms was sadly shadowed by the ignorance of our officers in matters affecting the health of their troops. Victories in the field count for little if the army be ravaged by disease resulting through failure to enforce the simple rules of sanitation and hygiene. Statistics show that ninety per cent of the deaths in the Army occur from diseases, mostly preventable. That being the fact it is evident that instruction in the art of war should include a course in the science pertaining to the preservation of health. Yet that is a subject that is almost entirely neglected at West Point. Graduates of that academy are proficient in the higher mathematics but they know very little about sanitation. Yet one is fully as important as the other. One of the leading medical men of the country tells this startling story. During the Spanish war a command in camp at a health resort consisted of the flower of American manhood. The commandant not only set aside the recommendations of his sanitary officers but by personal example incited his men to violate the most fundamental sanitary laws. The result was what might have been expected. Of the fifty thousand men in the command, twelve thousand were invalided and nearly one thousand died from preventable causes. There was evidence of similar neglect in other camps. The experience has clearly demonstrated the necessity for an improved course of military instruction.

The Transport Service

The advocates of government ownership should feel resentful toward the Administration at Washington in view of the proposed sale of the transport service on this coast to a private corporation. There are some people who think that the millennium will come about the time that the government secures control of everything that affects public convenience. They believe that government ownership means a reduction in cost and an improved service, and it is somewhat discouraging to them to be told that the learned statesmen in Washington are of the opinion that the National Government is incapable of handling the army transport service to advantage. We all know that there has been a lot of scandal connected with that service, that the government has been robbed right and left, and that the accommodations aboard the ships have been very bad, but there was hope of great improvement as soon as President Roosevelt had his attention called to the abuses. Instead of an effort in that direction, however, we are told that the Secretary of War is in favor of selling the transports and having the service conducted by a private corporation. What a sad commentary on our War Department! Surely the inefficiency of that department could not be more eloquently exemplified than through sale of the transports to improve the service. It has always been the boast of the officers of the American army that they never fail to render honest public service. In all their undertakings they are jealous of their honor. Yet it is owing to the scandalous manner in which the transport service has been conducted that it is now deemed advisable to transfer it to a private corporation. The Administration should deem it humiliating to make such a confession of incompetency. Supposing that by reason of corruption and incompetency in the mail service the Postmaster General should recommend that a contract to handle the mails be awarded to a private corporation, and that all the post-offices be turned over to the company, what would be the effect on the people? It would surely produce quite a shock if the Postoffice Department confessed its inability to render adequate service to the people. Yet that is precisely what the War Department is about to do.

As to Poetry

Sully-Prudhomme, who was awarded the forty thousand dollar prize offered by the Academy of Stocholm for the most valuable literary work from the point of view of idealism, has announced his intention of using the greater part of the income derived from the award for the encouragement of young poets. M. Sully-Prudhomme thinks the poets are a sensitive race not fit to fight their way against men of coarser grain, and are frozen by neglect His idea is to select a committee to examine the works of poets too poor to pay for their publication, to have their verses printed and present the volumes to the Academy for the Archon Deprousse Prizes. All of which is very nice, but if the people will not buy volumes of poetry, or read enough of it to make it worth while for publishers to bring it out, what's the use? This is not a poetic age, and the sensitive poets are like flowers blossoming out of time. Whether they come too soon or linger too late, they meet with the pitiless frost, and if they are not hardy enough to endure, they must succumb Really, there seems to be no good reason why poets should be supported merely because they write rhymes that no one cares for. It might be as much to the purpose if they could turn their attention in some more material direction and earn a comfortable subsistence. If their poetry is of any value—if it is anything more than a facility for making rhymes, it will insist on being written. Less in volume, undoubtedly, but better worth the doing. Common sense is beginning to assert itself in many ways, and people are not so ready, at the beginning of the new century, to accept the form for the substance. Any combination of colors spread over canvas and framed in an expanse of gilding is no longer accepted as a masterpiece, nor does any vocal disturbance pass for singing, nor any showy performance on a musical instrument deceive the general public into believing that it is listening to a genius. There is too much sophistication, too many people know how, and with the knowledge has come a lack of admiration and respect. Merely to be able to set words a-jingle will not exempt a man frow paying his tailor or his butcher, and though there are, doubtless, many amongst the wealthy who would have no other objection to playing the patron, and accepting the fulsome flattery of the bards, the ridicule sure to be heaped upon them by pulpit and press is enough to deter them. Zangwill tells somewhere of having met a once promising pupil of an art school carrying a kit of plumbers' tools, and on being interrogated as to wherefore, he made answer that he found he could not make a living by art so he "chucked it." There is nothing to prevent the disappointed professional poets from following his example.

Dame Fashion's Pranks

One of the morning dailies went into a fit of hysterics recently over the depravity of some mythical young woman who wore her hair pulled low on her forehead instead of having it brushed straight back or en pompadour. According to the writer, the woman had committed the unpardonable sin in trying to give herself the appearance of a gorilla, and the essence of the whole ten commandments was involved in the manner of wearing her hair. As a general rule, any attempt to meddle with the decrees of fashion is less than a thankless job, for if a woman wants to make herself ridiculous there is no surer way of accomplishing it than by not doing as others do. She is under no obligation to go to extremes, and if she be possessed of a modicum of common sense she will not do so; nevertheless, she cannot afford to ignore the age in which she lives. Men who are not engaged in the dry goods business have certain pet theories with regard to simplicity. In their estimation silk represents luxury and extravagance and muslin is a synonym for economy and moderation. Yet the "simple" gown which attracts their admiration may easily cost ten times the price of the silk which they anathematize. They idealize their remembrance of the fashions of their younger days, but if wife, daughter or sister were to attire herself according to their conceptions, there would be a more or less politely worded invitation to "quit making a guy of yourself." A few years ago, when a rumor gained currency that the old-fashioned hoop-skirt was to be revived, there was a howl of indignation from the younger generation, but the grandmothers complacently waited its advent, and indeed, those who can remember when that garment was going the way of all mundane fashions can also recall the indignation which was showered upon those indecent females who were the pioneers in discarding the voluminous cages. Even the brief craze for bicycle bloomers was mildly treated in comparison to the audacity which led to discarding crinoline. Scoop bonnets were once modesty personified, but when the popularity of the actress, Kate Castleton, led to a temporary revival of something similar, it was a brave or bold female of adult years who made a second public appearance in that style of head-covering. It is very well to refer to the classic draperies of the ancient Greeks, but it is doubtful if any possible modification of the flowing garments could make them suitable for every-day use. One has other things to do with hands and arms than disposing them in graceful positions, and life is sufficiently complicated without the necessity for devoting one's time to holding on to one's clothing. If Greek costume had not become familiar to us by the perpetuation of replicas of statuary, but we had met it through the medium of the family photograph album, adorning our own ancestors, it is a question whether it would be any more universally admired than other out-of-date clothing. Men who have so much to say about the absurdity of modern feminine fashions would be slow to re-adopt the costumes of a hundred years ago for themselves, yet there is no chance of comparison on the score of beauty. Fashions, like other things, move in cycles, and in just so often the latest new thing is but a modification of something familiar to an earlier age. This very matter of wearing the hair is a case in point. "Bangs" and curled locks over the forehead were once de rigeur, and after they had had their day the pompadour held sway. There are few who have reached middle age who cannot recall in their earliest years the absurd figure which some ancestor presented with her forehead hidden under her frizzled hair. Later on they can recall the revival of the fashion, first a thin fringe of straight locks, then a row of stiff and formal curls, and so on until in the height of the Langtry popularity, the "bangs" left precious little hair to be arranged in any other way. In those days, not to have covered the forehead with a fringe of some kind was to court comment, and the same critic who now affects to see a resemblance to the gorilla in the wearer of the belated bang would then have prated sweetly about the softening effect of the short locks, and the intellectual appearance of the "broad, low brow."

The Saunterer

A Human Interest Story

This is a story of gratitude and ingratitude, in which figure two characters of current interest. Many years ago a young man living in a small town in Germany saw an item in a village paper about a row between transportation companies in America. He learned that rates between New York and California had been cut, and he figured out that he had just sufficient money to make the trip. A few days later he was a steerage passenger on a steamer bound for New York. On his arrival in this country he was amazed to learn that the transportation companies had settled their difficulties, and that the old rates had been restored. He was short fifty dollars of the amount required to complete the journey. He was in great distress until he happened to recall that he had a friend in New York, a young man whom he had known in the old country.

Gratitude and Ingratitude

It was not long before the young immigrant found his friend, and to him he told the story of his plight. He ended the story with a request for a loan of fifty dollars. In those days a fifty-dollar bill was a fortune to a young man working for a pittance, but the immigrant obtained the loan and started for California. Within six months after his arrival he saved fifty dollars, and sent it back to his friend with heartfelt expressions of gratitude. He prospered here and grew rich, and he never forgot the kindness of the man who had enabled him to make the trip across the continent. The latter, meanwhile, struggled along in New York, married and reared a family, but he was always a comparatively poor man. Learning some years ago of the prosperity of his friend in California, he wrote to him asking if he could find employment here for his son. Glad of the opportunity to show his gratitude, the Californian replied that he could. The son, a boy in his teens, came hither and obtained employment in the establishment of his father's friend. The latter received him into his family, and reared him as though he were one of his own children. That youngster was Henry Fleischman, the defaulter, and I. W. Hellman was his benefactor, the man whom he robbed of considerably over a quarter of a million dollars.

Roberts and Harpending

George D. Roberts, who died the other day, was one of the best known mining operators that ever appeared on this coast. He was for a long time the partner of Harpending, the kingpin of promoters. Roberts and Harpending were the men who engineered that celebrated diamond mine furore of the sixties, which cost W. C. Ralston and other mining kings a pot of money. The so-called diamond mine in Arizona had been planted with gems of all kinds, and a big syndicate was organized to work it. Clarence King, whose death was reported the same day that the passing away of Roberts was mentioned was the man that exposed the swindle. He was a geological expert employed by the Government.

Engraved Wedding Announcements and Invitations

ROBERTSON, 126 Post Street San Francisco.

Lees with the Long Green

George Roberts had a hand in nearly all the big mining operations that attracted attention to this Coast, and out of which the bottom dropped in time. Harpending had headquarters in New York and he was always on the qui vive to finance the wild schemes of Roberts. After the diamond mine swindle Captain Lees went to Louisville, Kentucky, after Harpending and brought back one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to W. C. Ralston. The money was in greenbacks and to save express charges Lees stuffed the clothes in his trunk with the green goods. When he reached this city, and the trunk was delivered to him, it was in a most dilapidated condition, and he almost had heart disease until he opened it and found the money intact.

Harpending's Great Find

Though Roberts was at one time one of the most active mining operators on the coast, and one of the best known men in mining circles, the notice of his death attracted little attention. He died comparatively poor, but he was never without some big financial scheme on the tapis. Only a few years ago he was handling some big concession supposed to have been granted to him by the Russian government. A little before that he was suing John Mackey for a fortune. He represented that it was through him that Mr. Mackay became interested in the commercial cable. Roberts' old partner Harpending is again flourishing. A short time ago he purchased a mine in El Dorado county from Alvinza Hayward for ten thousand dollars. Hayward had turned the property down on the report of his expert. Soon after coming into possession Harpending blew down what had been looked upon as one of the walls and found a big vein of ore on the other side.

At the Tevis Home

Down at Monterey, Mrs. Baxter, the mother of Mrs. Hugh Tevis, is making herself greatly liked among the neighbors and townspeople of Pacific Grove and vicinity. She hobnobs with the bucolics and is regarded as a very genial-hearted woman, but Mrs. Tevis, on the contrary, is not at home to any one. She appears out of doors only to drive and is then heavily veiled.

Some Oakland Gossip

My Oakland correspondent writes: "Almost a year ago, Jean Howard, who had made her debut and went everywhere and entertained at the beautiful Vernon Heights' home of her father, John L. Howard, suddenly dropped out of everything. Lots of people thought she had gone East or something of that sort, but it seems that during all these months she has been matron at Miss Head's school in Berkeley, having left her home, it is said, because she could not agree with her stepmother. Most of the pupils at the school are from out of town, a circumstance which accounts for her whereabouts not becoming generally known. She has entirely given up society, and though accustomed to every luxury now goes about with her housekeeper's keys, and looks after the supplies. The only time she absented herself was during the opera season when she had season tickets. She has only one visitor, a gentleman, and his attentions have given rise to the rumor that it was a love affair that occasioned the friction at home. The gossips are wondering whether he is too poor to marry. The stepmother is up in music, having been a music teacher and in demand at smart musicales and the affairs of the Ebell society. But the sticklers of Oakland in matters of strict propriety declare that she is a little shy on some things because she was recently seen visiting some people in their new home, with her husband, who was in a business suit, while she was attired in full ball costume, with gloves to the shoulders. And they tell the story that when she saw the silver candelabra in the dining-room she exclaimed, 'Why, do you have those things in the house all the time? I thought people only hired them with the caterer, as I do.'"

Oaklanders are Piqued

Many people on the other side of the bay, who feel that they had a hand in helping to boost Mrs. McNear, Sr., socially, are feeling rather sore over the invitation list sent out for the coming ball. One of them remarked to me the other day, "We feel that when the entire family stopped kissing the hem of the fair Georgie's garments long enough to ask if they might give her a ball, and she said they might if she were not expected to meet Oaklanders, that the McNears should have stood up for us and said, 'No Oaklanders, no ball—take your choice.'" Continuing, the same representative of Oakland society said, "The McNears have never been noted for their generosity. They have given a few inexpensive teas, but have not entertained much, so if they hand out the kind of favors you spoke of in connection with the ball in a recent issue, society will have something to talk about."

The Hawaiian Way

Apropos of my paragraphs on the Kaffir marriage last week, a correspondent sends me the following Hawaiian story somewhat on the same lines. "There was an absence of conventionality in Honolulu before Annexation that was at times amusing. One day I was among the guests at the home of an official connected with the British diplomatic service. He had married a woman of mixed blood. It was well mixed, too, for it included Kanaka, Caucasian and Mongolian. We were smoking on the veranda and I happened to call attention to a child at play whose countenance had a Mongolian cast. 'Whose child is that?' I asked. 'My wife says it's mine,' replied the Britisher, 'but I don't more than half believe her.' Then we all went on smoking."

Before an Audience of Friends

If Marguerite Sylva's husband had not made objection to her appearing any longer before the public in tights, it might have been many a long year before we should have seen Maude Lilian Berry Fisher Moulan in opera. But Miss Sylva's husband registered his kick and the consequence is we are to see Mrs. Moulan, or Madame Berri as she is known on the bills, in "The Princess Chic" next week. One hears that she has improved so much since she made her debut in Professor Rosewald's opera, "He's a She," that not even her closest friends will be able to pick flaws in her acting. Maude Berry always sang well but she put no soul or life into her acting. All her friends, her ex-schoolmates and her former teachers are prepared to pass judgment upon the new star. Let us hope they will be less exacting, and will show their friendship in less hostile fashion than did Sybil Sanderson's old friends and schoolmates.

The Social Side

Mrs. Hearst had a large box party at the symphony concert last Friday and among her guests was Mrs. Charles S. Wheeler. There was considerable rubbering by those in the box's immediate neighborhood, chiefly in Mrs. Wheeler's direction. Since the latter's portrait by Orrin Peck was shown at the Bohemian club exhibition its subject has been as much stared at as any of London's professional beauties. Last Friday's concert was a big improvement on the former one and the audience enthused to such an extent that the cold without and within was almost forgotten. The audience was larger than at the opening one of the series.

A Suggestion

I am moved to ask the Symphony Society why it does not enliven its programs by an occasional concerto for violin or piano? It is not necessary to go abroad for one; we have many fine artists here who are capable of playing to orchestral accompaniment. During the Bauer series of symphony concerts there were solos by Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger and Guilio Minetti. Bauer also had occasional vocalists on his programs, but that was not such an harmonious combination. A vocal solo spoils the symmetry of a symphony program. Little Augusta Cottlow played with Bauer's orchestra upon one occasion, other solo pianists of that season being Samuel Fleishman, Julia Newman (now Mrs. Hochstadter) and Hugo Mansfeldt. Ovide Musin appeared with Scheel's orchestra. It might be a good idea to secure Josef Hofmann to play a concerto with the Steindorff symphony orchestra.

Americans in Paris

My correspondent in cher Paree writes me that the elect of the American colony had a charming Christmas celebration, due to the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. de Young. The de Youngs arrived in Paris less than a week before Noel, but they speedily arranged their holiday entertainment, sending out invitations for an American Christmas party. They had brought with them from New York handsome ornaments for the tree. The suite of five rooms was decorated in harmony, a huge Christmas tree standing in the large salon and smaller trees beaming with varihued electric lights were placed on stands about the room. In the afternoon there was a reception. This was followed by a Christmas dinner a l'Americaine. Among the guests were the American Ambassador, with his wife and daughter, Consul-General Gowdy and family, Marquis and Marquise d'Oyley, Mr. and Mrs. Morton Mitchell.

Mr. and Mrs. T. T. Williams are located at the Richelieu for the winter. Mrs. Williams, who is fond of entertaining and is a delightful hostess, has planned a series of little dinners that are to come off before Lent.

A Case of Bribery

Henry Ach, the attorney, was accused in a Los Angeles court the other day, of having bribed a fair witness with a box of candy. The witness was employed as a waitress in a hotel at Cayucos. The opposing counsel in the case expressed their disapproval of the San Francisco attorney's conduct, whereupon Ach thus addressed the court: "May it please the Court," he said, "I brand the statements of my learned opponents as false. 'Tis true that this simple country maiden was presented with a pound or so of saccharine delights, but that I gave them to her, or that there was any ulterior motive in the trifling token of esteem, is absolutely and unqualifiedly untrue. The candy was given to this witness by my young legal assistant, and in the giving there was, I confess, a desire to influence the mind of the charming girl who, as has been shown here, is a waitress in the Cayucos hotel. When my aid was there he suffered from the pangs of hunger. In order to get a square meal he presented the young woman who served his table with a box of candy. And thence-

A Crush of Bridal Couples

The Palace hotel did a rushing business in bridal parties last week. In one day twelve honeymoon couples registered there and occupied the choicest rooms. Traveling men who are used to making the Palace their home during their stay in San Francisco were sore aggrieved at not being able to get their favorite apartments. One well-known drummer came in on the Overland, and bustling up to the desk, asked Chief Clerk McDermott: "Got number fifty-five ready?"

"Newly married pair in that room," said the clerk.

"Gimme the corner room on the third floor, Market and New Montgomery," said the commercial man.

"Young fellow and his wife there," replied the clerk sorrowfully.

"Well, for heaven's sake, are there any more loving couples in the house?"

"Only ten more," said Mac.

"Rush me over to the Grand, and give me a sleeping potion," moaned the drummer. "Wake me up when the epidemic is over. I must be on the trail of Cupid himself."

Balancing the Tricks of Trade

My London correspondent writes me that though the Yankees may have captured London commercially and triumphantly planted the dollar sign on the marts of trade the rogues of merry England are adopting retaliatory measures on visiting Americans that tend to even up the cash balance. Wealthy Americans are always selected for the plucking and the tricks played are certainly up-to-date in clever "Swindling as a Fine Art." Here is the way a prominent New Yorker and his bride were recently hoodwinked: The two were shopping in Regent street. The husband stepped into a tobacconist's for a moment when the wife felt her arm suddenly seized and a masculine voice said, kindly, "So I've found you at last, my dear?" Naturally the bride was indignant and frightened and turned sharply on the man. He was smartly dressed and looked quite the gentleman.

At sight of her face he apologized profusely and explained that he had mistaken her for his wife because she wore a similar coat and hat. Just then the surprised husband came up. The polite stranger explained the situation, renewed his apologies and presented his card—Lord So-and-So. The guileless husband accepted it and presented his own and when his Lordship left the happy pair he declared he must bring her Ladyship to call on them. Next day a smart brougham drove up to the hotel and his Lordship was shown in accompanied by a stunningly dressed blonde. When they left they invited the bridal couple to luncheon. Everything was very swell. The following day, the Lord and Lady were invited to dinner in the apartments of the young folks. Soon afterwards her Ladyship complained of feeling ill and was taken into the bedroom of the bride while the two men went out for a stroll. Shortly afterwards the wife got a wire announcing an accident to her husband and begging her to come at once to a certain distant hotel. Of course she went at once, found he was not there, and hastened back to her hotel in great agitation. Her husband smilingly welcomed her. Explanations, and the discovery that their rooms had been looted of gems, money and valuable trifles.

Casey's Oratorical Gem

They were discussing oratory in the Cabinet the other day, and one member declared that it was the spread eagle brand of eloquence that moved the hearts of the people. He contended that high sounding phrases and rounded periods appeal to the popular heart. Then up spake James H. O'Brien, the chief of the Cabinet, in defense of simple Anglo-Saxon, and he related how Michael Casey, the boss of the Teamsters' Union drove home a few plain facts at Metropolitan hall one night in the late campaign. According to O'Brien, Casey's was the most eloquent speech of the campaign and it won for the teamster a seat in the Board of Public Works. Casey's oratorical gem as recited by O'Brien is as follows: "I'm no orriter loike Delmas. I'm a simple, plain man, come to talk a few plain facts to plain people. Iv ye want to keep in office a Chafe iv Poleece to hammer th' heads off iv ye in th' next three months as he's bin doin' in th' pasht, and ye want to keep Pay Haich McCarthy an' th' rist iv Phaylan's shtattelites in office vote f'r Joe Tobin. On th' other hand iv yer in favor iv keepin' Sar-rgint Brophy (hisses) I see ye know him, an' Whitman in office, then vote for Asey Wells. But iv ye want to get rid iv th' whole lot iv them, vote f'r Eugene Schmitz." (Loud and prolonged applause).

A Boom Picture

Mrs "Pat" Campbell or plain "Mrs. Pat" as she is familiarly known to London playgoers, has been getting a deal of advertising since her arrival in this country. I am reminded of the fact that she was given a great boom early in her career by a famous artist who painted her picture and called it "A Rag, a Bone

An Effeminate Function

Even in the breezy, bustling city of Chicago signs of decadence such as one should hardly expect to encounter anywhere beyond the city limits of esthetic Newport, are becoming manifest. The latest wrinkle in social functions there is a pink tea party for the male debutant. Surely, that sort of thing is about as close to the border line of effeminacy as anything the emasculate Lehr ever did.

Mrs. Isidore Burns has issued cards for a matinee reception to be given next Thursday at her residence, 404 Van Ness avenue.

Prefers Private Life

Lieutenant Martin Crimmins who wooed, won, turned pretty Miss Margaret Cole Catholic and carried her off to the Philippines as his bride in the short space of a month last year, is soon to retire from the army. He will do so at the request of his wife who has been almost as heroic as he during the recent stormy days on the island of Lamar where Lieutenant Crimmins is stationed. Unlike many of the officers' wives Mrs. Crimmins did not remain in Manila to enjoy the social whirl. She was on the tempestuous island with her husband and she has no yearning for more warfare. She will reside in New York. By the way, I hear that her father-in-law, John D. Crimmins of New York, has been knighted by the Pope, and now it is rumored that he contemplates marrying the wealthy Miss Leary, New York's famous bachelor maid. She has an established position in New York society and it was she who brought out Margaret Cole Crimmins' sister-in-law, now Mrs. Jennings. Miss Leary is one of the richest women in Gotham and devotes nearly all her income to charities. She is a Countess by grace of the Pope.

He Never Heard of Them

When John D. Crimmins was informed by a reporter that his son was engaged to Miss Cole of San Francisco he exclaimed: "Who are the Coles? I never heard of them." Think of that! a Crimmins, too! When Mrs. Cole heard about it she was indignant. And why shou'dn't she be? Mrs. Cole was one of the Custis family of Virginia. She was moreover the beautiful Miss Florence Custis of the same family to which Washington's step-children belonged. Her daughter Florence who will come out next year is the prettiest of the family and inherited much of the mother's beauty. She is also the cleverest of the girls. The Coles were in reduced circumstances when Margaret married the son of the New York multi-millionaire.

Oxnard's Troubles and Blessing

Henry Oxnard is the storm centre of the present great war between the cane and suger beet kings. When he left here for Washington to engage in the conflict he was regarded at the War and Agricultural departments as well as among the perambulating statesmen of the capital as the accredited representative of the sugar beet interests. Ever since his advent there he has been conferring with the heads of the big committees, hobnobbing with Representatives, and consulting Senators. Everybody thought he was working tooth and toe-nail for beet sugar and the restriction of concessions to Cuban sugar. Now the startling shell has been fired into the sugar beet camp that Oxnard has a foot in both camps and that the American Sugar Trust likewise has quietly interested itself in sugar beet lands so as to play safety in the outcome. It will be remembered that Oxnard, in times past, was strongly identified with the American Sugar Trust. Oxnard denies the story that has been sprung against him and declares it is part of the machinations of his unscrupulous opponents. To back his assertions he has got the Secretary of Agriculture to declare that he has been uncompromising from the start in his opposition to free sugar from Cuba or to any concessions in the tariff duties. Despite this showing telegrams are pouring in on Congressmen repudiating offers of a compromise and insisting that if Mr. Oxnard has offered any he will not be endured by the sugar beet battalions. The sugar beet men declare, Oxnard or no Oxnard, that it is an uncompromising fight to secure the enforcement of the full Dingley duties without drawback or rebate.

But Henry Oxnard has received one blessed compensation for all the nerve rackings he is undergoing in the bitter contest in Washington: a daughter has arrived at his home here. No such luck has fallen in the other Oxnard homes. The newcomer more than balances all Henry has undergone since the Sunday papers devoted so much space to exploiting his venturesomeness in marrying the maid of his brother's wife. His home life has been immeasurably happy ever since he set up his domestic establishment.

Doesn't Know the Lady

Mr. E. E. Morgan writes me from New York that I erred in stating that he was soon to marry the widow of Mr. Coulter Brinker. I thought the information came from a reliable source but Mr. Morgan assures me that he is not engaged and that he does not know Mrs. Brinker.

A Mysterious Beauty

The recent arrest in Paris of a woman calling herself the maid of the late Countess Castiglione recalls many memories of the inscrutable beauty whose death occurred two years ago. The Countess was an Italian born in Spezzia, and was married to a Piedmontese. She grew up in Florence according to her own sweet will almost on the knees of Louis Napoleon, of whom her grandfather was the Italian advocate, a cousin of Cavour. One of her first conquests was Victor Emmanuel. Among his gifts was a pearl necklace that in the sale of her effects went for eighty thousand dollars. Its casket was inscribed, "Alla bella Michia, degli Povero Padrono." The Countess' wilfulness and eccentricity frightened Cavour. Once established as the King's favorite, he could put no limit as to what she might do. He saw that Paris was the only fitting theatre for the most peerless beauty the world had seen since the time of Helen, and he sent her there on state business

Her Parisian Career

The Emperor became her devoted slave, and at her will admitted Cavour to the Congress of Paris. Although the English envoys snubbed him, she made them sorry enough to have done it. Cavour went to Plombiero, where the marriage of Princess Clothilde and Prince Napoleon and the campaign of 1859 were agreed upon. The policy of the Prince Consort and the English was defeated and these had, as Palmerston remarked, "to take their gruel." The Countess was a wily diplomate. While appearing to care only for her own loveliness, she was never credited with brains, but even those who thought her empty-headed felt that she was an enigma. She was without a heart, but so kind that she could not hurt a fly. As she had only Kings for lovers she never ruined any one. She worshiped herself. The perfection of her form, the beauty of her skin, her hair, eyes, and the singular harmony of her whole person were above all that poets had sung or dreamed. She kept in her salon a cast of her leg and foot, worshiping it as long as she lived.

Died Among Memories of the Past

When she grew old she lived in an apartment in the Place Vendome, in which the light of day never entered. She could not endure that the rays of the sun should look upon her faded loveliness. Napoleon allowed her to present herself at a ball in the Tuileries, where she went, wearing the famous collar of diamonds with the inscription, "I belong to my master," in flashing stones. So greatly was this resented by the Empress that it was the cause of the famous night journey to Scotland. The Empress never invited the Countess to the Tuileries, the latter's invitation always coming from the Emperor. Once she went to a fancy ball in the airy costume of Salammbo. The Empress immediately sent an aide-de-camp to her with a fur cloak and bade her return to her carriage. She left in her will minute directions as to her burial, but as this was unsigned her casket of letters in Rothschild's bank instead of being burned was sent to the French archives. "The chemise de nuit de Compeigne" was not her shroud and the stuffed dogs that were to be buried with her were thrown away as rubbish. She never had a woman for her friend, and of the two or three men who remained faithful to her there was not, at the moment of her death, one in Paris to see that her wishes were carried out. In default of a will her Italian nephew inherited her effects, and these personal treasures were so numerous that three houses in Paris were filled with them.

Flirted with His Mother-in-Law

From an occasional correspondent, who was recently in Holland, I have received the version of the recent fracas in Queen Wilhelmina's household, which, he assures me, is generally accepted in court circles, though it never got into print. According to my correspondent, Prince Heinrich, as the Queen's consort is called in Holland, is a rough German trooper, who behaves in a most offensive manner on all occasions. He never fought a duel in his life, and couldn't be induced to do so. Consequently, there is no truth in the report of his having wounded Herr van Tetts in a passage at arms. It seems that on the day of the row, Heinrich was full of Munchen beer. He had been out hunting with some German friends, and on his return went straight to his mother-in-law's boudoir and began a flirtation with Queen Emma. He became so persistent in his efforts at amorous dalliance that she threatened to tell her daughter and have his ears boxed by the hot-tempered young Queen. At dinner the Prince drank champagne and became so reckless that he undertook to relate before the whole company his little adventure with his mother-in-law. The two Queens, horrified, got up to go and van Tetts begged the Prince to "shut up," whereupon he received a punch in the stomach which brought on peritonitis.

Alice Hager's Latest Trophy

Though Alice Hager lost the much-coveted golf trophy to Mrs. Gilman-Brown at the Presidio, she won a far better trophy in the estimation of her many staunch friends—that of being the most sportsmanlike woman on the links. Quite a lot of the liveliest representatives of the smart set foregathered at the contest, under the impression that some of the awkward and embarrassing scenes that did so much to electrify the game at Del Monte might be repeated. On that memorable occasion certain members of the Del

Monte set did not hesitate to bandy cruel gibes and cruder interferences, with the prime view of disconcerting Mrs. Gilman Brown, whom they referred to as "that interloper from somewhere near San Rafael." Mrs. Scott led the sortie on behalf of the Del Monte talent, and did all in her power to have her favorite win. An ardent ally, at the moment that Mrs. Gilman-Brown was in the very act of making a highly important stroke, suddenly cried out, "Wait a minute, please, till I get my kodak focused. Wait a minute; I want to take your picture."

The Rooters Get a Setback

Those women were at hand again at Monday's contest, but Alice Hager wouldn't for a moment allow any such tactics to be attempted in any game where she was a participant. She treated her opponent so considerately and fairly, and stood so stoutly between her and the "rooters," that the latter very early in the game realized they must quit or rouse the Hager wrath. Mrs. Gilman-Brown was given every opportunity to develop her steady, careful game in an undisturbed way. Miss Hager covered the ground with her usual brilliant, dashing game. Everybody remarked the simple and natural grace of all her poses in making the strokes. I heard an English globe-trotter say that her graceful attitudes in the game were like a series of living pictures of an ideal golf-girl playing the game. "Gibson, Christy and Wenzell," he declared, "would bless their lucky stars if they could coax such a stunningly natural player to pose for them." At ex-Mayor Phelan's dinner in honor of the Martins she was the centre of attention in a simple blue satin gown. An envious maid who was contemplating her said, ruefully, "Only a girl with such a figure as Alice's would dare to wear that gown without a lot of distracting frills and furbelows."

Oakland's Dictum

As nobody ever takes Oakland seriously, probably the Hopkins sisters care nothing for the criticisms that have been passed upon their figures by the people across the bay. Mrs. Gus Taylor and Mrs. Will Taylor were exquisitely gowned at the tea the McNears gave in honor of Georgie Hopkins' bethrothal to a son of the house. But one of the papers said that the eldest of the sisterly trio looked like "a telephone pole hung with handsome stuffs." Possibly that writer did not know that Mrs. Gus Taylor prides herself on her slimness. She never gains a pound if she can help it. And if she were not of such ethereal proportions she would be far less attractive. Her sister Edna is not thin. Indeed, she is the one of the family, aside from Cousin Frances, who can wear decolete.

Let there be Darkness

When we sit in theatres or concert halls and listen to the music of geniuses and orchestras, the singing of divas or cantatrices—shall we sit in light or darkness? Shall we feast the eyes as well as the ears? Is it a distraction or an aid to understanding of the harmonies, to see the gestures of the singers, the straining at the high and sustained notes, the sawing of the air by the leader, the swaying of the violinists, the expansion of the chests of the cornet and clarinet blowers, the quick changes of the man who plays the cymbals, beats the drum, imitates the horses' galloping and the thunder, and all the dozen movements and poses which fill the eye while the music pours in one's ears? This is the question, a correspondent informs me, which has divided Germany into two opposing camps, and which threatens to raise a merry row in San Francisco.

A Local Experiment

Is it true that a pernicious effect is produced upon music lovers at public concerts by feminine beauty, with its delightful accessories, as seen in a blaze of artificial light, reflected by crystal, gold and glittering diamonds? Some say yes, and demand that for really esthetic and artistic souls there must be no light, or if any, not enough to distract from the harmonies flooding the hall. The younger and more intense school in the Fatherland has already decreed darkness. These devotees claim that only when the eye sees nothing, does the spirit grasp the fullness of the meaning in the divine creation of Haydn, Chopin, Beethoven, Mozart and the other masters. The lights went out at a small concert in this city some time ago and the experience was voted delightful by the buds and belles who sat with their men friends, while the old boys and matrons say they felt no particular inspiration from the gloom. The buds, belles and gay bachelors say they felt lots.

Cards are out announcing the marriage in San Rafael, December twenty-eighth, of Miss Sarah Vanstone and Mr. Herbert Clarke.

A Popular Priest

Rev. Father Joseph McQuaid has reason to be proud of his achievement—the building of an eighteen thousand dollar church within one year after being assigned to a parish which had been created for him. Father McQuaid is probably the most popular clergyman in this city. He served as a chaplain in the Philippines, and won the admiration of all that met him by his ardent devotion to duty. Soon after his return he was put in charge of a parish without a church, and he immediately set himself to the task of raising money for the erection of a House of Worship. Such was his popularity that subscriptions to the fund came from all parts of the city. The new church was dedicated last Sunday.

The Photographic Salon

There are some very worthy things among the exhibits at the photographic salon now under way at the Hopkins. No one expects at an exhibition of photographs that every one shall be a masterpiece. No salon, even in Paris or Munich, was ever composed entirely of chefs-d'oeuvres. But in the Hopkins salon there is plenty of good material. Exhibitors hail from all parts of the world. London, Denmark, Toronto, Milwaukee, Chicago, Los Angeles and Portland are among the places represented. There is a fair amount of rubbish shown but that would be a matter of course in a photographic salon. But there are some remarkable achievements in portraiture that balance the dross. Arnold Genthe has his usual fine array of portraits, a new treatment of Ophelia being noteworthy. Pedar Bruguiere has two speaking "studies of an Archbishop." Ida Diserens, the pianiste, shows that she has other talent beside that of music by her charming portrait of little Lurline Matson. Many regard Laura Adams' portraits as the gems of the salon. Coquelin is an especially strong study of the comedian's face. Furman's portrait of Mr. Sterling possesses the quality of reality. Mrs. George Fife shows a "Home Portrait" that is interestingly treated. Dassonville's poses of Charlie Dickman and H. J. Breuer, two of the Bohemian club's coterie of artists, are lifelike.

Other than Portraits

As individual in treatment as anything in the salon is a Marguerite by Will Walker of Portland. The face and figure are full of expression. Another choice bit is H. d'Arcy Powers' impressionistic gypsy girl, "Cintra." Schulze has some bright Chinese and negro studies. Frank Eugene's landscapes are most effective treatments. Walter A. Scott has one of the largest showings in the salon, all of interest. I liked the one he has titled "Tangled Meshes" the best of all. Mrs. Scott has one exhibit, a glimpse of beach in an admirable light. Oscar Maurer sent a number of photographs to the salon. "A Windy Day," showing two women ascending a hill in the teeth of a gale, is very original. Another clever treatment of wind is F. E. Monteverde's "March," a beautiful girl with her hair hanging loose. Edward Kemp has a priest in a convent garden that is good, also an old peasant woman of equal excellence. Piatt's sheep study, "Eve on Shasta's Slopes," is in his best vein. Another of Piatt's, a man mending nets, is a vigorous bit, but his ballet girl, "Waiting Her Turn," is a trifle too serious a treatment of a light subject. L. E. Rea's "Fortune Teller" deserves mention. One of the best of the exhibits was sent by a Chicagoan, Mr. Bourke. It is "A Gray Day in Town," showing a corner of a busy thoroughfare on a sunless day. Lily White of Portland has some poetic studies—"The Meadow," a green print, "Bridge of Hope" and "In the Shadow of the Rock." Annie Brigman's "Spirit of Easter," a sad-faced madonna bearing an Easter lily in her thin hands, is worth more than a passing glance. McFarland's "Entering Port" is but one of this camera expert's fine studies shown.

There are two striking pictures in red lights. Carl Ackerman has one—"A Neglected Lesson." It shows a girl fallen asleep over her piano keys. Walter Zimmerman of Philadelphia has the other—"Alarm of Fire." This is a man's huge head, with jaws extended. It is somewhat satyr-like but this adds to its fascination. This is only a hasty and fragmentary review of what is really a splendid showing of what can be done by amateur as well as professional photographers. There was a crush at the opening night of the salon, when the members of the Art Association and the Camera club held their reception. Sir Henry Heyman's orchestra rendered a delightful program of classic numbers.

The Smart and the Slow

The dance to be given next week by the group of young ladies in which Alice Brigham is a conspicuous figure will not be attended by the Burlingame set. There are two prominent cliques in society. The Smiths, Harringtons, Brighams, Eels, Coffins and Kittles belong to what are known as the exclusives. They are friendly with the Blingumites, but regard those of the newer set as upstarts. And the patricians of Burlingame regard the conservatives as deadly slow, and sometimes poke fun at the cut of their gowns. The Hopkins', Taylors, Carolans and Morgans pride themselves on being the smartest people in town. They lead in styles and are pleased to show that slang comes trippingly from the tongue. The old set of girls who are giving the dance are wedded to the traditions of ye olden tyme, and are subdued in manner and speech. While they have my respectful admiration I rather like the zip and sparkle of Blingum.

The Stanford Brand

From an architectural standpoint Stanford University has much to boast of, but in the recently completed memorial arch over the main entrance it has a wonderfully grotesque and incongruous feature. It has the Stanford brand upon it, and that is unfortunate.

But it was the Stanford's money that founded the institution and with the Stanford millions it has been endowed, and it is to endure to apotheosize a Stanford. Therefore, perhaps Mrs. Stanford is justified in her desire to have the Stanford Ego imbedded into it, never to be effaced. But it is unfortunate that her queer whims should be responsible for such fatuous frumpery as that which mars the memorial arch. It is too bad that the generous and distinguished lady is not satisfied to have the name of her son and the fame of her husband's philanthropy perpetuated by the institution itself.

An Architectural Monstrosity

The memorial arch as originally designed was a masterpiece. It was chaste, symmetrical, stately and beautifully proportioned, but as it exists it presents a most incongruous spectacle. It was ruined because Mrs. Stanford learned that the Dewey arch in New York was twenty-two feet higher than the one which had been designed for the university. The intelligence jarred her. She resolved to have the height of the memorial arch raised. And raised it was. And now it is a thing of ugliness and a nightmare forever. It is an architectural monstrosity.

An Allegorical Study

But the incongruity of the arch is not its only ridiculous feature. The artist designed for the frieze allegorical figures depicting The Progress of Civilization. Mrs. Stanford thought it would be a splendid idea to have amongst the figures those of herself and husband. She ordered them sculptured and the sculptor threw up his job. Thereupon she hired a new artist who cared more for the long green than he did for art, and the consequence is that Mr. and Mrs. Stanford are in The Progress of Civilization. They are on horseback, coming over the mountains, and there is a big engine behind them. The letter S is conspicuous on their saddle bags.

She Banished the Ivy

Shortly after the erection of the university buildings at Palo Alto, slips of ivy that came from each of the colleges connected with Oxford and Cambridge universities were planted in the corners of the buildings. The ivy grew with wonderful rapidity and spread gracefully over the walls. It was greatly admired by visitors, and those that were familiar with the growth of ivy in Europe were incredulous when told the date of the erection of the college buildings. There was a sentiment connected with the ivy by reason of the historical places from which the slips were obtained, but the clinging vines are no longer to be seen on the walls. Mrs. Stanford thought they marred the walls and ordered them torn down and the stones scraped to look as though they were brand new.

Lawrence Hanley Ill

Only a few of the friends of Lawrence Hanley know that the once popular actor is lying seriously ill in St. Mary's hospital, his life hanging by a thread. As soon as he is able to be moved he is to be banished to a warmer climate, on which change hangs his only hope of recovery. I know of no actor, with the exception of Maurice Barrymore, who made more friends in and out of the profession than did Lawrence Hanley. He was in the support of all the big legitimate stars and a few years ago started out as a star himself. He arranged a play from "David Garrick," elaborating the scenes and giving as a prologue an act from one of Shakespeare's dramas. He produced this in an Oakland theatre and later in the Grand Opera House, this city.

His Romantic Marriage

It was shortly before this that he married Edith Lemmert, the daughter of a Los Angeles hotel man, a pretty young girl with a neat dot and dramatic aspirations. Her father opposed her going on the stage, but she followed her own sweet will, married Lawrence Hanley and came up here to appear as the leading lady in his play. The two were devoted lovers and a photograph still exists showing them en duo in a very affectionate pose. They went East after this and soon stories began to waft westward that Hanley was no longer a loving husband.

The Sequel

The Los Angeles girl's dream of love ended. There was a divorce and she returned to her people in Los Angeles. Some time afterward her little boy, on whom after her separation from his father she had centred her heart, was run over by a trolley car. A saddened woman, with all hopes crushed, she again turned to the stage, joining a company that finally journeyed to San Francisco and thence Eastward. Hanley, meanwhile, was appearing with Rose Coghlan and other stars, but his reckless way of living in time undermined his health. During the early days of his career he took the gold cure but its effects were not permanent.

Shifty Perkins

A correspondent wants to know why I dislike Senator Perkins. He suggests that a man who has been elected Governor of the State, and who has served on the Board of Regents of the State University and been elected to the United States Senate should command the respect of everybody. I do not dislike Senator Perkins. My only objection to him is that he is addicted to the habit of shifting his position, and that his methods are suggestive of the ways of the petty politician. He is one of the many Senators who would be retired from office if they had to depend on the direct vote of the people. The circumstances of his being a successful politician doesn't invoke respect or admiration. Worse men than Perkins have been successful job-chasers.

She will Woo in Other Channels

Word comes from New York that Frances Joliffe has about made up her mind to enter the newspaper field and to give up her dramatic yearnings. This is not really any new idea of Miss Joliffe's, for when she attended the high school here she always said she intended to be a "lady journalist." When she entered Vassar college it was her determination to study with view to a journalistic career. But her chance hit in a Greek play at the college caused her ambition to veer in an entirely different direction. Her mates persuaded her that she was a coming star, and when she received encouragement from Madame Modjeska and others, the college student threw her literary desires to the winds and enrolled under the banner of the guild of dramatic neophytes. Her decision was reported in the press despatches and soon all the set in which the Joliffe sisters moved were discussing, with either condemnatory or laudatory inflections, the latest move of Frances.

She Came Home

In the course of time Frances came back to San Francisco. In spite of family opposition, and this was bitterly strong, she persisted in her choice of a profession. Her mother, hoping that by yielding a trifle her daughter might be wooed from her heart's desire, permitted her to appear at the Alcazar. The critics noticed her kindly and praised her promise and her pretty frocks. But Frances was not satisfied with this short experience. She wished to keep on and do more. Spasmodically she appeared with other companies and it was not so long ago that all the papers were mentioning in eulogistic terms her charming version of the French maid in 'Naughty Anthony." Evidently, however, the climb up fame's ladder by the stage route is too slow for Miss Joliffe, else she would not be considering her first choice of a field to win her spurs.

Their Mother Believed in Practical Education

Apropos of the Joliffes, I was looking over a collection of school photographs the other day, and one of them represented a normal class of the Girls' High School during Mrs. Mary Kincaid's regime. Some of the embryonic teachers shown therein have since become prominent in that profession, some in society and others in the world of art. But one of the faces drew attention for the reason that its owner apparently desired to avoid observation. Her head is turned so that there is but a trifling glimpse of a profile. This head is that of the second of the Joliffe sisters—Hattie—who was then of the normal class. The mother of the Joliffe girls held advanced ideas on bringing them up. She believed in fitting all her daughters for serious work, even if it were not necessary for them to live by their labor. All of them were sent to the public schools and two of them were fitted to be teachers. But Hattie never liked the notion of becoming an instructor of the young. She attended the normal on compulsion and that is why she objected to having her features commemorated in a class picture.

A Quick Recovery

When the news first reached this city of the marriage of Genevieve Goad-Martin and Mr. Robinson Reilly, it was accompanied by the report that the man from Washington had jilted Adelaide Murphy. I have never received confirmation of the report, but evidently the loss of Mr. Reilly, inflicted no very serious aches in Miss Murphy's heart, for the other day the news came out from Washington that she was engaged to Mr. Outhout Siebert, the son of a wealthy retired wool merchant of New York. Miss Murphy and her mother returned recently from abroad. They have been in Washington since their return.

Murphy-Siebert

It is a pity that none of our local youth, golden or otherwise, proved sufficiently attractive to keep Adelaide Murphy with us. Of all the girls in society, there has never been one better liked than she. Therese Morgan is popular, but not as Attie Murphy was. The latter possesses that je ne sais quoi we term charm, and without which beauty or wit counts for nothing. When the story traveled westward that Genevieve Goad Martin had won Miss Murphy's admirer from her, and married him herself, the younger woman's friends immediately declared that if the witching widow-bride ever came this way she should be boycotted. And now that Attie is engaged to a man of considerable more pretensions than the fickle Robinson Reilly, of course her friends' good wishes are sincere.

Monsieur Objected to Biddle

Papa Murphy is going to Washington, D. C., to take a look at the bridegroom before the marriage will be permitted to take place. Of course this is only a form, for Papa Murphy really has little to say with regard to his daughters' actions. When Ethel married young Biddle her father refused his consent up to the moment of the marriage. He would not give a nickel toward the expense of the wedding. Mamma Murphy paid for everything. His only objection to the marriage was that Biddle was poor. His being of the Philadelphia Biddles cut no figure with the bank president. If the wool merchant retired on a handsome competency I have no doubt that Monsieur Murphy will give his blessing.

The Watch Dog of the Dot

Mamma Murphy has the same family virtue of financial forethought, I understand, but to a less extent for when Robinson Reilly was paying his devoirs to her daughter, just prior to his disappearance with Mrs. Martin, Mrs. Murphy took the precaution of cabling to Washington to ascertain his exact standing socially and financially. Good matches for his daughters have been almost as great a consideration with Mr. Murphy as good interest on his investments. At one time Ogden Hoffman was supposed to be epris with Adelaide. When Papa Murphy learned the condition of affairs he promptly packed her off to Europe and strictly forbade any correspondence. That ended the matter—commercially. The last bolt of Cupid to rouse his spleen was prompted by Maxwell McNutt. As the European trip had been so successful in the first instance it was repeated. It was on this tour that Mr. Siebert encountered the party and paid his court.

An Unlucky Chaperon

Mr. and Mrs. S. G. Murphy will no doubt get great comfort out of the fact that Attie's future is at last satisfactorily determined. There were times when it caused more perturbation in the family than a bad note discovered among the I. O. U.'s in the bank over which her forethoughtful father presides. By the bye, Mrs. Murphy has been anything but fortunate in chaperoning spirited young girls. Lucy Banning, while under her motherly care, slipped away unbeknownst in a runaway marriage with young Bradbury of Los Angeles. On the recent European trip Mrs. Murphy was supposed to be looking after Mrs. Martin when the latter disappeared Parisward and re-appeared a few days later as the wife of Robinson Reilly.

A Mother Preferred

That exclusive organization, the Stockton chapter Daughters of the American Revolution, writes my correspondent from the Slough City, met the other day and sweet bells of Revolutionary stock jangled out of tune. A National convention of the D. A. R. is to be held in Washington, D. C., next month and Stockton chapter met to elect a delegate and alternate. The charming Miss Peters was nominated for delegate. Mrs. Clary, of the older set, was nominated for alternate. Mrs. Thomas, also a matron, objected remarking there should be a transposal of the nominees, that it was an unseemly arrangement for a mother of a family to serve as alternate to a young lady. Mrs. Thomas said she believed deference was due to the older members, one of whom should have the post of honor. When she had finished, disquietude filled the room. The meeting was at Miss Peters' home; hence, the situation was embarrassing. There was that unrest which marks the impatience of an audience at the theatre when the curtain is still unlifted and it is half-past eight.

And the Daughters Wept

There was imminent peril of a contest between these Daughters of the Revolution. Shades of Trenton and Concord! At length, Mrs. Clary spoke. She said she would like to be chosen delegate but would not accept the minor compliment of alternate. As an evidence of her unselfishness, she suggested Miss Peters' mother for delegate. Mrs. Peters, who by the way is Regent of the society and a very bright woman, demurred and said she did not seek the favor nor would she permit the office to seek her. When Mrs. Clary resumed her seat all present exchanged minute-gun glances and realized that a volley had been fired which would be heard 'round the gossiping world. Then some of the other ladies spoke and some of them cried—just a little. Oh, what a dreadful carnage of feelings! Finally, Prudence intervened and Mrs. Clary, like Cornwallis, capitulated. Miss Peters was then elected and declared the envoy plenipotentiary of the Stockton D. A. R. to Washington.

The Charming Delegate

Miss Peters is one of Stockton's best known and best liked young women and she is not unknown to San Francisco's smart set. She was Stockton's carnival Queen Genevieve, and one of the organizers of the Stockton D. A. R. and is at present Historian of the chapter. I am informed that it is she who selected the name El Toyon, as the local organization is known and designated. El Toyon is the name of a plant indigenous to the Sierras and is an appropriate as well as a pretty name for this western lodge of lovely femininity. Besides a pleasing personality, Miss Peters has a plenitude of that minted substance which enables one to travel well. Her election as delegate to Washington carries with it no allowance for mileage. She must pay all her expenses from her private purse. Miss Peters will certainly make a good impression in Washington society, if brains and good looks count for anything in the drawing rooms of the Nation's capital. I hear the young lady is to go to Washington with Mrs. John F. Swift of San Francisco. Mrs. Swift is the head and front of the D. A. R. in this State.

An Important Test Case

The case of Lewis vs. Dunn is likely to haunt the Supreme Court of this State. It was in that case that the decision was rendered knocking out the codes on a somewhat flimsy technicality. Lawyers are of the opinion that the decision was against public policy for it is likely to result in some very serious complications. It appears that there are many Acts of the Legislature which were adopted in precisely the same form as that followed in the measure by which the codes were adopted. If the codes are unconstitutional all of those Acts are, too. One of them relates to the selection of juries in criminal cases. A lawyer who was interested in the adoption of the codes has undertaken to make a test of one of the cases, and his purpose is to embarrass the Supreme Court.

Many Convicts may be Freed

The case is that of a man convicted of murder in a Southern county, and sentenced to be hanged. The attorney who has interested himself in the case just to bother the Supreme Court appealed to that tribunal the other day for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of his client, but Chief Justice Beatty knew what was behind the application and denied it. The attorney is now going before the United States Supreme Court on a writ of error which was granted him by Judge Morrow. He declares that he is confident that he will win the case, and that if he does he will be able to liberate half the prisoners in the penitentiaries of the States. Surely there is a prospect of the Supreme Court being jarred.

End of a Sumptuous Feast

Now that J. B. Crockett has finally gone out of office as President of the Gas company, I wonder what will become of his various relatives who fed at the same sumptuous table. Nepotism was ever a favorite virtue of that richly-paid office-holder. Most of them have drawn handsome salaries and are now in very comfortable circumstances, notably the Greenwoods, into whose set his sister married. His daughter Caro, long before she became Mrs. Laurence Scott, had the faculty of looking "sic itur ad astra," as the schoolgirls beginning Latin used to call it. Like her father and the Greenwoods, she is now in a position to give full freedom to the aspirations of her delightfully retrousse nose and say "figs" to the indefatigable stock manipulators who have at last ousted the various members of the family from the highly lucrative salaries they enjoyed so long.

The Match Maker

The match-maker in the case of Edith McBean and Dr. Kierstedt was Miss Mary Kip. She introduced them and the first meeting took place in this city, and not in Manila as some people have declared. The first person informed of the engagement was Miss Kip She is in Columbus, Ohio, with her sister, Mrs. Edie. She was wired the glad tidings.

Talent Weds Wealth

The revelation of the fact that Maud Treadwell and Maxwell McNutt are married produced somewhat of a shock in certain quarters. I cannot understand why it should. The ways of Dan Cupid are inscrutable. Yet there is nothing surprising in that marriage. Mr. McNutt is the son of Dr. McNutt the physician who became a Police Commissioner through the kindness of Mayor Phelan. Maud Treadwell is the daughter of Mabel Treadwell, a lady who made considerable social history. Maud was divorced a short time ago. She has money. Mr. McNutt has talent. I have heard that the bride is quite clever. But above all she has boodles of money.

A very delightful dinner was given by Mr. and Mrs. Fred H. Hanson on Tuesday evening at their home, 1224 Haight street.

The Fairy Godmother

I have just learned that Ethel Murphy Biddle was the fairy who brought about the engagement between her sister and Mr. Siebert. The Murphys were only recently in the swim here and the old families were resentful when Ethel married "Jack" Biddle. I heard a lot of them sneer, "Of course money will do anything." Both the Murphy girls were presented at the British court by their aunt, Mrs. Swift, whose husband is the millionaire pork packer of Chicago and Boston. Mrs. Swift and her daughter spent a winter here and the Murphys gave a big fancy dress ball for them to which Alice Hoffmann went as Romola, and Adelaide as a water lily. Later Miss Swift was rumored engaged to a Russian prince, but she married a Boston swell with a home at Brookline, Massachusetts. Mrs. "Jack" Biddle and Miss Murphy speak French perfectly and Mrs. Biddle has a French accent even in ordinary conversation. Murphy pere has just finished his new residence and now the birds have flown before the nest is occupied.

English vs. American Bachelors

Daring, black-eyed Janet Cushing of San Jose started a discussion in an English drawing room where she is visiting which promises to produce a whirlwind in the correspondence columns of the London dailies. In her free California spirit she frankly observed that she thought young English bachelors could not be compared with young Americans in gallantry to ladies, that they never returned a woman's hospitality and were woefully remiss in other respects. Mrs. Alec Tweedie, a woman with a caustic pen, who happened to be present, picked up the remark, endorsed it, emphasized it and expatiated on it in a biting article on the "Degenerate Manners of the Modern Englishman." The Daily Mail stirred up the indignation and the first day brought such a shower of indignant replies from young Englishmen that the air hasn't had a chance to clear yet. In a nutshell their retort to Miss Cushing's observation is that no English girl would ever expect men to take her to tea, the theatre, for a drive in the park, or to give her candy or flowers, and that the American girl, by her willingness to accept such attentions, comes in for considerable criticism. But Miss Cushing's declaration that she would not waste hospitality over those who would not return it almost drove her excited listeners into hysteria. They termed it rank "commercialism—society commercialism," and sputtered triumphantly over the claim that Bret Harte must be right in depicting California as still being in the wild west period and full of men with those overgrown beards, boots and freely-handled pistols that are so necessary for success in "Society on the Stanislaus."

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

The Twin Stars

Marie Wells and Marie Oge were voted the most stunning girls at the Goewey-Brice-Brigham tea last Saturday. Miss Oge was in white and her hat consisted of waving white plumes. Miss Wells, who by the way, notwithstanding a very strong resemblance is only a third cousin of Miss Oge, wore a pink frock with a hat that was almost a replica of herkinswoman's Both young ladies wore long black satin redingotes trimmed with cream lace.

The above statistics are by sea only. In addition thereto there were 5,000,000 gallons of California wine sent by rail to New York during the year 1901.

The object of this table is to show that the foreign importation of wine is decreasing each year. Although every restaurant, hotel and club in the United States has on its wine list supposed French wine, which shows very plainly that the wine consumer is being humbugged and, because he is not honest with himself, he is paying for the French label on the California wine.

As statistics show the demand is increasing for the finer grades of California wines and it will not be long before all the leading hotels and restaurants in the United States will carry the California wines in preference to foreign brands. This should be an incentive to Californians to boost our own product.

The statistics given have been furnished by Mr. C. J. Wetmore, President of the Wetmore Bowen Company, and can be relied upon as being accurate.

Madame Lucie

Madame Lucie folded her dimpled hands in her lap and told herself that she was growing tired of Jack. It was too bad. Jack was devoted, unfailing, and faithful, but now it had arrived that she began to question if the game was worth the candle. There were times when she felt the mild eyes of her husband fixed upon her, and when she fancied that she saw the sweeping torrent that sometimes runs under those natures of outward calm. It was only fancy, of course, but when one really feels a thing, it might as well exist. Then, too, those quiet men—one never could tell exactly what they would do, and a fair name—aye, even to the most reckless—is the sweetest thing in the world.

Madame Lucie arose and looked at herself in the mirror. She was yet young. At thirty-seven one only begins to live; it takes all those years to learn how. She ran her fingers through her hair and sparks of the firelight flashed from the circles on her hand. She caught the lights in the mirror and smiled complacently. Ah, it is good to be rich! Jack was poor. His gifts were—she turned her head toward the writing-desk—the monogrammed ink-stand, the silver tray and—she ran her hand down the left side of her gown—the filigree bottle of the chatelaine. The rings, the laces, the rustling gowns, the maids, the splendor, and respect, on one scale; the ink-stand, the trinkets, the absolute devotion, the camaraderie, and—she drew her hand across her eyes hastily, and sat down facing the fire again.

The day was closing and the room was full of shadows. With the death of the day came the possibilities of the passing of the brighter half of her life. Yes, it was well to begin anew. And before it was too late. There was Pauline, there was Yvonne, there was Madeline. They were good wives. But what did they do? Oh, yes. They were always at home when Monsieur le Mari arrived; they folded his garments, they arranged his cravats, they embroidered his bretelles, they sent him notes of endearment at least twice a day. Ah, it was easy enough. She could do it. And they were happy, good wives. Well, she could be happy, too. Jack was a dear fellow. She would miss him. His moods always dovetailed with hers, he saw things with her eyes, he never disappointed her, and his good nature was contagious. Yes, she would miss him awfully.

Madame Lucie watched the coals settle down from blazing blocks to a solid pack of red. She shivered and drew her chair a little closer to the warmth. Something had gone out of her and it had left her as cold as ice.

"Madame," Natalie cried in entering, "Monsieur has sent for his valise. He goes for a week's hunting with Monsieur Delano tonight on the six o'clock boat, and wishes much dispatch."

Madame Lucie arose confused.

"I am startled, Natalie," she answered, queerly. "Monsieur is going away tonight? He has not come to say goodbye?"

"Oh, Madame, it is always so. He does not come to tell us. Madame will remember that he goes hunting with so little notice every time."

Madame Lucie began to laugh.

"Oh, Natalie, I have been dreaming," she said, lightly. "Of course, of course, he always goes. It is just so. I had forgotten."

"And shall I pack the —?"

"No, no." Madame Lucie interposed. "I will pack the valise for him. Fetch it and the things."

Natalie went out hastily.

"Ah, I shall show him what a good wife I can be! All for him, all for Henri. I am born again. It is much happiness to live and to be good," she cried to herself, pacing the floor. "Quick, quick, Natalie," as the maid returned. "the valise here. So. Now the heaviest things first. No, no, I must do it all. It will please Monsieur. And there, the coat, and, pah—the dear one, how he loves it—the muddy, faded hat. And so—now, all is in but the handkerchiefs and the brushes. Wait—a note to him, in the midst of it all. What a surprise! Dear Henri. How delighted he will be! Ah, he shall know what it is to be thought of!" Madame Lucie flurried to her desk and reached out her hand for the crested paper. Her fingers touched the silver tray and lingered there. With her other hand she tipped back the top of the monogrammed ink-stand, and her eyes caught the ivory-painted portrait that was artfully set into the left side of the third pigeon-hole. The mouth of the picture had a downward curve, the nostrils were inflated, and the eyes were laughing at her. She sprang up and stumbled across to her chair by the fire.

"Finish it as you will, Natalie," she cried, "only make haste and be gone."

"Will there be any message to Monsieur?" Natalie asked, with her hand upon the door.

"None, except that I wish that he may enjoy himself," Madame Lucie answered, slowly, with her eyes upon the fire.

Ugh, how cold it was! And dark, too! The afternoons were too short—it was a miserable time of the year. A week alone. Quite, quite alone. To sit three times a day at the table facing the priceless tea-urn and sparkling glasses, and all alone. Oh, yes, quite alone. To sit by herself, just so, during seven evenings, when even the day wearied, and the fire itself would resolve to ashes and be gone. To be a good wife, filled with love, and tender thoughts, and patience—ah, that was the secret of good wives—patience, patience, patience.

Madame Lucie's hands wandered again over her hair, and down the laces and jewels on her bodice. Then she let them lie quietly in her lap. She glanced over her shoulder The dull glow of the fire showed itself in the silver and trifles that stood on the writing-desk. Her eyes dwelt on the third pigeon-hole on the left, and then her lids grew heavy and half shut out the bright light of her eyes.

"Lucie, Lucie," a man's voice called as the door opened and swung closed again. "All alone, and in the dark?"

Madame Lucie arose, touched a button, and the room was flooded with light.

"Neither, Jack," she answered, quietly, with a smile.

"And what are you doing?" he asked, gently stepping toward her.

Madame Lucie drew the curtains with her hand. Under the shadow of the heavy portieres, no light from the fire or chandeliers struck the circles on her fingers—the gems were dead and lustreless.

"Jack," she said, advancing toward the centre of the room, "I have been making resolutions and—"

"Lucie," he replied, with the curve of the picture mouth, the inflation of the painted nostrils, the laugh of the portrait eyes, "resolutions are well enough in their place, but they can never come between you and me, can they?" His hands were awaiting hers.

Madame Lucie looked at the dead fire in silence. Seven days, a lifetime, of patience, in the balance against a world of happiness. It was not of her doing, this tottering of chance. A half an hour before she would have had it otherwise. What was she to cavil at the outweighing of one scale against the other? A bird clock in the hallway called out—one, two, three, up to seven.

"Can they, Lucie?" he insisted.

Madame Lucie's breath came in jerks, and she bit her lips until the color left them and fled in a warm flag to her cheeks. In her face shone a light that comes when one has regained something that was all but lost.

Hon. E. B. Edson

Railroad Commissioner Edson has been attracting considerable attention to himself of late. Men of sound common sense and probity usually do when elevated to a position of trust. Such is the prominence which he has assumed by reason of his official acts that there has been frequent mention of his name in connection with the gubernatorial office. Mr. Edson was born in Dixon, Illinois, in 1838, and he has been a resident of this State since 1863. Shortly after his arrival he settled on a farm in Shasta Valley with his brother and sister. The farm was located near Gazelle station on the line of the California and Oregon Railroad, where he still resides. He was educated at the Rock River Seminary, at Mt. Morris, Illinois, and was a schoolmate of Senator Cullom and Congressman

Hitt, both of whom he numbers among his intimate acquaintances. Like Tom Reed of Maine he began his career as a school-teacher in the country schools near his home, and he followed that occupation until 1862, when he enlisted in Company F, First Illinois Artillery. He served one year, and owing to an attack of pneumonia he was retired for disability. It was thought he would not live to reach his home, but his robust constitution pulled him through. Shortly after coming to this State Mr. Edson started in the cattle-raising business, and he has been engaged in it ever since. Today he ranks among the largest beef cattle feeders in Northern California. Mr. Edson is a married man but has no children. Though he has always been more or less active in the political career, and identified with the Republican party as one of its strong supporters he never coveted the honors of office. But in 1898 he was induced to take the nomination for Railroad Commissioner, and his popularity was attested by an astonishing vote. He was given a majority of four thousand in a district which, at the previous election gave Bryan a majority of about two thousand. His is the largest district in the State, and includes all the counties north of the bay except Marin. Though he has taken a firm stand as Railroad Commissioner, he is not regarded as an anti-railroad man. His purpose appears to be to do justice to both the corporations and the people. His business interests occupy nearly all his time and he is not a seeker after political preferment.

The Fable of the Neglected Wife

A Neglected Wife, with Intent to While away the Dull Hours when her Husband was Away and her Dearest Friend was Previously Engaged, took up the study of Palmistry. She soon became so Interested that she was no longer Cognizant of the fact that she was Neglected. And she became such an Expert at Reading Hands that her friends told her she ought to Hang out a Sign and Charge four-bits for a Reading.

One of the hands that finally Came to her was that of her Dearest Friend. She perused it Carefully and found that among other things her friend had a Heart Sorrow. She loved a Man from whom she was separated by a Hopeless Barrier.

"He is a Married Man, I should fancy," was the interpretation, "and that must be the Barrier."

But the Dearest Friend did not Open her Heart as she had her Hand. Nevertheless the Amateur Palmest felt thereafter a Deep Sympathy for her friend. She tried by every Means in her Power to Lighten her Burden of Sorrow, loading her with Gifts and frequently Inviting her to go to Places of Amusement and to functions where Gaiety was rampant.

She had almost forgotten the existence of her Husband when one evening he told her he had heard from a Mutual Friend that she was Great on Palmistry, and would she please Read his Hand.

Very much Pleased, she Complied with his Request with Alacrity. But what was her Surprise to find that he had a Heart Sorrow and that a Hopeless Barrier separated him from the Object of his Love.

"Where have I seen a Hand like this?" she asked herself, and then she remembered that the other Heart Sorrow was in the Hand of her Dearest Friend.

She said nothing Then but set her Wits to work and finally she Discovered that her Suspicions were well Founded. The Hopeless Barrier was Herself. The reason of her husband's Neglect and her Dearest Friend's frequent Previous Engagements was the Same.

At first she thought of Getting a Divorce but then she reasoned:

"No, that would be Wrong. In the First Place, if my husband had not Neglected me, I should never have taken up this study which gives me such Pleasure. Besides, if I get a Divorce, their Barrier will no longer be Hopeless. They can go to Reno and get married. No, I shall leave Matters as they Are. They don't know I know, but I know. And now beside Palmistry I have another Interest in Life. I can watch my Husband's affair with my Dearest Friend."

STAGE

A Charming Claire

Laura Nelson Hall, the Grand's leading lady, is very much prettier off the stage than on. She has a skin like a peach, which naturally is not observable under the stage make-up. As the heroine of "Claire and the Forgemaster" she has a role quite within the scope of her talents and her conception is admirable. She has done other good work of late. In "Cavalleria Rusticana" she played the rustic coquette, Santuzza's rival, with much intelligence.

Romance Ad Lib

There are two modes of extracting enjoyment from the play at the Alcazar this week. You can take it seriously and in that case its romantic features will rouse your enthusiasm. Or, you can take it the other way. "For the White Rose" has a chivalric young Irishman, dashing, insouciant and devil-may-care as a Lever creation, for its hero. He has the favorite Irish name, Larry, and is a crackerjack at the games of love and war. He rushes through difficulties as if he wore an invisible cloak and the gallery gods' enthusiasm is roused to white heat more than once. Mr. Alsop plays Larry and joyously revels in the part. Miss Convere is the pretty heroine and the Alcazar players are variously distributed through the cast.

Juliet Crosby and Fred Belasco were among the audience at Tuesday night's production of "Under the Gaslight." It was a good performance, very carefully presented as to detail, and the railroad scene is the sensation of the piece. Georgie Cooper's Peachblossom is worthy of being placed beside that of Ada Deaves and other stars who have essayed the role. The Central theatre is the most comfortable theatre in town this week, being warmed to a pleasant degree. The additions to its exterior are very becoming.

Casualties

Word comes to me from New York that the sensational staircase fight in "A Gentleman of France" has not been carried to its triumphant success without serious mishaps. Mr. Bellew himself has received not less than a half-dozen sword cuts, while Mr. George Morton, who is an excellent swordsman, and is thrown into the assault on De Marsac for this reason, has had his pleural cavity punctured by Mr. Bellew's trusty blade, and now wears a breast-plate in self-protection; not less than three of Fresnoy's desperadoes have had to be conveyed home in cabs on different occasions; and as the capsheaf, Mr. Harvey Benton, the young man who does the sensational fall, while he has not yet broken his neck, came so near it last Saturday night that a physician had to be summoned before he could leave the theatre.

Lost Her Cue

Dorothy Dorr, in private life Mrs. H. J. W. Dam, and last year a member of the Alcazar stock, is appearing in "Frocks and Frills," Sydney Grundy's new play at Daly's, New York. On the first night of the production there was a little incident not down in the bill of which the Evening Sun says: "Miss Dorothy Dorr, an actress of charm and skill, who has not been seen here in many a long year, managed to rise above her surroundings. She was a society queen, and in the delicate task of trying a new gown on, a corps of dressmakers had reduced her very nearly to first principles. One of her shoulder straps slipped its trolley, or its cue, or something, and—well, it was another instance of that good old maxim, Put not your trust in bodices." Hilda Spong and Rose Eytinge are in the cast of "Frocks and Frills."

Juvenile Fairyland

The first week in February will see the Mechanics' Pavilion metamorphosed into Fairyland. Louis W. Buckley, who has managed so many successful street fairs, has arranged a juvenile carnival to be given at the Pavilion from February first to eighth. Interesting features will be an educational and industrial exhibition of children's work, and other interesting objects, booths with shows of all kinds, amateur operettas, concerts and plays, merry-go-rounds, ponies and burros, scenic railway in miniature, etc. The Pavilion will be beautifully decorated with fairy scenes as the motif. The entertainment will be modeled after the famed London Crystal Palace juvenile exhibitions. It will be an absolute novelty here.

Julia Arthur was quite seriously injured in a sleigh-upset this week. This mishap will postpone for a time the actress' proposed return to the stage. She announced but a short time ago her intention to return to the profession she forsook when she married Mr. Cheney of Boston. Her return will be in "A Winter's Tale."

R. Beers Loos, formerly of Music and Drama, before that journal was bought by the Dramatic Review and incorporated with the latter, has started a new theatrical and sporting paper, The Mascot. Mr. Loos understands all about dramatic matters, as he has had years of experience, and he is also a clever and entertaining writer.

William A. Brady and Joseph R. Grismer will produce Edward W. Townsend's play "A Daughter of the Tenements," next season. It is founded on the dramatist's novel of that name.

Attractions Next Week

There will be a new star at the Grand next week, Edwin Arden, who has been playing the principal roles in Charles Frohman's companies for a number of years, last season playing the crafty Prince Metternich in "L'Aiglon" in support of Maude Adams. Mr. Arden is not only an actor of experience and capacity; he is also a playwright of considerable reputation, his play "Zorah" being one of his greatest successes. This play will be produced during his short starring engagement. The play selected for Mr. Arden's opening week, commencing Monday next, is Alexander Salvini's original version of "Don Caesar de Bazan." This play has created much comment during the present season on account of the rivalry between James K. Hackett and William Faversham, who are both playing different versions of it in New York to immense houses. The coming production at the Grand will be strongly cast, lavishly mounted and appropriately costumed.

Maude Lillian Berri will be the chief attraction in "Princess Chic" at the Columbia next week, but Tommy Leary will also receive a warm welcome. The opera is by Kirk La Shelle and the music is said to be bright and catchy and the libretto very clever. New and handsome costumes and elaborate scenery are features of the production.

The public has pronounced for the continuance of "For the White Rose" at the Alcazar and the romantic drama will run another week. Scenically, the production is one of the best ever presented at the Alcazar, Sherwood Forest, a feudal castle, an English wayside inn and other scenes being exceptionally elaborate. The management has spared no pains in correctly costuming its players for the period of the fifteenth century. Following "For the White Rose" will be given "The Danites."

"The Fire Patrol" by the author of "The White Squadron," "The Midnight Alarm" and other sensational melodramas, will be the Central's attraction next week.

The production of "The Ameer" at the Tivoli has been postponed for one week and will be given January twenty-seventh. For next week "The Toymaker" with Annie Meyers as the doll will hold the boards. All the old favorites will be in the cast. There will be a matinee for the children on Saturday, every child attending to get a handsome toy.

Some wonderful acrobats, the family of Da Coma, will make their vaudeville debut at the Orpheum next week. Their work is said to be absolutely unique. The Taylor twin sisters, fancy and trick skaters, promise a novel turn. While performing the most intricate evolutions on their rollers they render many exquisite numbers on the violin. Ada Arnoldson, a new importation, is a singer, possessed of a rich contralto voice. Kara, the great juggler, will vary his act, the three Faust sisters will introduce new terpsichorean evolutions, Arthur Buckner, the eminent bicyclist, promises new wheeling sensations and Jacques Inaudi, the wonderful mathematician, will puzzle San Francisco for the last times. The biograph will show new pictures.

Talented Singers

Miss Zita Fahey scored a triumph as vocal soloist in the last Arion concert on January twelfth, a unanimous demonstration following her song, "The Daily Question" and her encore "Two Marionettes." The young singer has a very sympathetic and sweet voice and her execution is excellent. She is one of Mr. Joseph Greven's pupils. Mr. Greven, by the way, is preparing several advanced pupils to appear in a series of three operatic concerts representing scenes from standard operas in costume, and which will take place in February, March and April.

Collamarini has gone East

The operatic concert given under Frank Healey's direction in Oakland on Tuesday evening was a great success, but it cannot be repeated on this side of the bay, at least for some weeks to come, owing to the fact that the company left for the East on Wednesday night. They will go via Portland and Seattle and will give concerts in those cities and others en route. Collamarini sang all her numbers so well at the Oakland concert that she gained other laurels to add to her "Carmen" wreath. She gave selections from Thomas and Saint Saens, and sang "Oh Promise Me" and "La Paloma" as encores. Repetto, Russo and Ferrari were all enthusiastically received, and M. Benoist, the pianist, was not omitted in the applause. Cortese and Napoleone took part in the Lucia sextet and Cupid Newbauer of the Tivoli orchestra played the flute obligato for the mad scene.

THE ART OF PORTRAITURE

San Francisco gained much when Dr. Arnold Genthe forsook the field of amateur photography where he was recognized leader to enter the realms of portraiture, there to win new laurels. Fascinating as had been his pictures of Chinatown, each one of them a gem, a characteristic bit of the oriental life that flourishes in San Francisco, charming as were his landscapes, it was in portraiture that Dr. Genthe was to win international fame. For at once the matchless quality of his art was appreciated, and during the past two years almost every person of note, distinguished in art, science, literature, on the lyric or on the dramatic stage, has sat before Dr. Genthe's camera. Among them may be named Emma Eames, Fritzi-Scheff, Melba, Paderewski, Nance O'Neil, Henry Miller, Edwin Markham, not to speak of our own local celebrtities, club men, society leaders, merchant princes and kings of finance. There is an inimitable quality about all his work, whether the picture be that of a society bud, the full-grown rose of a society matron, a bluff old warrior, or a happy roly-poly baby. His photos have the charm of personality. They are instinct with life and always express the very highest qualities of the subject. For Dr. Genthe is both a scholar and a student, an intellectual man himself, and his eye at once detects the most characteristic pose, the best expression possible to his subject. A portrait with a picture value is the result. In all photographic exhibitions Dr. Genthe's work is a leading feature. Last year he won the first prize at the photographic salon. Many of his studies have been reproduced in the first magazines of the day, and in the periodicals devoted to the photographic art. Dr. Genthe is an authority, both writing and illustrating his articles. A recent one on childhood is simply cherubic. Numerous efforts have been made to induce Dr. Genthe to take up his abode in New York, but his heart is true to San Francisco.

A NEW BRANCH OF LABOR

The new School of Copper-plate, and Card Engraving and Designing established by F. W. Gardam offers a splendid field for ambitious young Californians desiring to enter some business or profession whose ranks are not already over-crowded. Mr. Gardam was formerly with Tiffany & Co., New York, Payot Upham & Co. of San Francisco, and lately with Lowman & Hanford of Seattle. The scarcity of competent artists and engravers on copper and steel caused Mr. Gardam to conceive the idea of founding this school. There is no more lucrative craft or profession, for Mr. Gardam himself has never accepted less than two hundred and fifty dollars per month, his services being in great demand at that figure. From seventy-five to one hundred dollars is the average monthly pay, though in many cases it reaches one hundred and fifty and two hundred dollars. For a moderate compensation Mr. Gardam now offers in his School of Engraving and Designing the opportunity of acquiring a degree of skill in these branches.

MUSIC

The Second Symphony

Last Friday's symphony concert showed a great improvement over its predecessor. Mr. Steindorff seems to be catching the spirit of his work better and the work therefore holds together better. In the Fest overture the orchestra did particularly well, the familiar songs, "How Can I Leave Thee?" and "It Was a Dream" being pleasantly reminiscent as they occurred at frequent intervals in various forms throughout the overture. The Prize song from "Die Meistersinger" was delicately executed but was a bit sleepy, but the scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" was beautifully done and won a rousing encore, when it was in part repeated. The Beethoven symphony number five started off well but the andante con moto was quite a largo and made one wish to help it along a bit. The work on this symphony gave one the impression of being too heavy for the orchestra or having been imperfectly rehearsed. However, if improvement continues the orchestra will "get there" and certainly the last concert was most creditable and enjoyable as well.

The Second Series

Yesterday's concert concluded the first series of the Symphony Society's venture, and its success has persuaded the society to announce a second series. There will be three concerts at the Grand Opera House on the afternoons of January thirty-first and February fourteenth and twenty-eighth. Steindorff will be the leader as before. Among the important symphonic works to be produced are the Dvorak "New World"; Schumann, No. 4, D minor; MacDowell, Indian Suite; Victor Herbert, Suite Romantique, first time here; Lalo, Rhapsodie; Chebrier, "Espanola," new; Tschaikowsky, Nutcracker Suite, and Glinka's overture, "The Life of the Czar." The subscription sale will begin at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s Monday morning, prices ranging for the three concerts from one dollar and twenty-five cents to three dollars and a half.

Josef Hofmann, the Great Pianist

Some Futures

Mrs. Marriner-Campbell is very busy with her winter's professional work, one of the most important features of which has been the drilling of a quartet composed of Florence Doane, soprano, Grace Carroll, contralto, Herbert Williams, tenor and Willard Young bass, with Mrs. W. J. Batcheldor at the piano, in the "Daisy Chain" which the quartet will give this afternoon before the Sacramento Saturday club on "Artist's Day." For the twenty-eighth Mrs. Campbell is preparing the music to illustrate a paper on the "Evolution of Hymnody" in America by the Rev. F. L. Hosmer of the Unitarian church, Berkeley, to be read before the "D. A. R's." On the evening of February fourth the Colonial quartet will sing at the reception given by the clubs of this city to the federated clubs of the State. On February fifth at the afternoon session excerpts from the "Daisy Chain" will be given by the quartet. On February twenty-fifth Mrs. Campbell has direction of the program for "Music Day" of the California club. The Colonial quartet is growing rapidly in popularity, judging by the demand for its services. During the past month the quartet has sung before the Philomath club, at the Heppner musicale given in honor of Marshall Giselman, as well as at other functions. It is constantly adding to its repertoire and Mrs. Campbell has just received from H. J. Stewart, now of Boston, four new numbers of his own arrangement of old English songs.

The Pasmores

The next Pasmore concert is close at hand and will take place next Tuesday evening, in the maple room of the Palace hotel as before. The program promises to be quite as interesting as those of the preceding concerts and will open with three classic numbers, the trio in E flat No. 1 by Beethoven, by Mary, Susan and Dorothy, the three talented children who have a large repertoire of music which they play entirely from memory. Indeed, it is said of these really wonderful children that after months have passed in which a composition has not been even taken from the shelves, they can take it up and give a perfect rendition of it without notes. Mr. Pasmore is to sing Beethoven's beautiful "Adelaide" and Mary Pasmore will play a violin solo, Bach's air for the G string, with string quartet accompaniment. Part two will contain musical literature of a lighter character in which little Dorothy has a cello solo by Klengel, and there are original songs by W. J. McCoy and John Harraden Pratt, local composers, which will be sung by Mrs. Basford and Mrs. Gardner; Mrs. Basford, Mr. Nowlan and Mr. Pasmore in the part songs. Other numbers will be given by Mrs. Charles Hughes of Oakland—her first appearance in San Francisco—Mr. Nauman and Mr. Taubles.

At St. Dominic's church the regular monthly service is to be held tomorrow evening with original compositions by James Hamilton Howe. The numbers comprise a cantata, Ave Maria quintet, Ave Maria solo, trio, duet and other solos. The regular solo choir will be assisted by Mr. Ernest George, late of Berlin and Dusseldorf in grand opera work, Miss Catvolje Barbe, violiniste, Mrs. T. E. Burrill, Miss Mabel Gordon, Mrs. H. B. Montague, Mr. A. C. Lawrence. The solo choir is composed of Miss Lily Roeder, Miss Joseph, Miss McCloskey, Mrs. Clark, Messrs. Onslow, Long, Webb, Van Lingham.

The Minetti string quartet gave the fourth concert of its present season last Saturday evening with the usual fine program, in which the quartet was assisted by Frederic Biggerstaff, the pianist. The program consisted of a Bazzini string quartet in D minor, a Rubinstein piano and cello sonate performed by Arthur Weiss and Mr. Biggerstaff, and a Schubert string quartet in D minor (op. posth.). The fifth and last concert will take place on the evening of February eighth, with numbers from Beethoven, Handel and Dvorak. Mr. Fleishman will assist at the piano.

Wednesday evening was the date for the Bonelli Conservatory recital which will receive a thorough review next week.

A Revival

Donizetti's old opera, "La Fille du Regiment," was revived this week at the Metropolitan Opera House New York, by the Grau singers. Sembrich, Van Cauteren Salignac, Gilibert, Dufriche and Viviani were in the cast. It is years since this charming opera was sung in San Francisco. The Hess company produced it at the Orpheum with Pauline d'Allemand as Marie. In the New York production Sembrich won all hearts as the drumming vivandiere. In the first rataplan song she won the house. As a close to the performance she sang Arditi's "Parla" with the high D.

Madame Fabbri-Mueller, long known to the music public through her reputation as one of the foremost singers of the past half-century, is to have a benefit concert as a fitting close to her professional work. Many of our professionals have taken an active interest in the movement as well as prominent professional men and the affair promises to be a splendid success. The concert will be given in the near future and among the patrons are notably the names of Henry Heyman, Robert Tolmie, Madame de Seminario, Paul Steindorff, Canter Stark, W. L. Greenbaum, J. H. Howe, Mrs. Birmingham, Louis von der Mehden Jr., Mrs. Louise Marriner-Campbell, H. B. Pasmore, Harry Barnhart, Fred Zech Jr., Arthur Fickenscher and many others equally well known. Madame Mueller is a veteran artist of many years' active service and it is to be hoped her closing celebration of professional activity will be a brilliant one.

Josef Hofmann's coming is an event of extraordinary interest, as so much has been read and heard of this celebrity during the past ten years. Some of his programs are magnificent affairs. The advance sale of seats for the two matinee recitals at the Columbia will begin next Monday morning at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s. Reserved seats are to be two dollars, one dollar and a half, one dollar, and fifty cents. The program for the first recital will be: Variations, F minor (Haydn); Sonate Apassionata, F minor, Op. 57 (Beethoven); Impromptu, G major; Soiree de Vienne (Schubert); Ballade, A flat major; Prelude, No. 25, valse, A flat (Chopin); Gnomenreigen (Liszt); Nachtstuck (Schumann); Jongleur (Moszkowski); overture, Tannhauser (Wagner).

Thursday was the occasion of the second of the Lewys lectures when Mr. Lewys lectured on the "Fundamental Principles of Scale and Arpeggio Playing." After the lecture a short piano recital was given by Miss Mary Carrington. Next Thursday's lecture will be upon "Dynamic Changes, Accent, Crescendo, and Methods of Fingering," after which Miss Carrington will play in illustration of the subject.

The pupils of Mrs. A. Bridge held a recital at her studio, 2232 Broadway, on Saturday last during which a program of some twenty-four numbers was rendered from the following composers: Franz, Walther, Old English songs, Chadwick, Lehman, Johns, Ellen Wright, "A. L.," Loewe, Thorne, Massenet, Foote, Old French, Valerie White, Mendelssohn, Von Weber. The work was very artistic and the musicale an enjoyable affair.

Thursday afternoon was the date of the third of the Zech string quartet concerts. It occurred too late for more than a brief notice and will be reviewed next week. Thursday evening a dramatic recital was given by Eleanor C. Haber with musical numbers by Albert I. Elkus of Sacramento and Harry Samuels of this city. A full notice will be given of the program in the next issue.

Mrs. M. E. Blanchard has opened a studio at 1320 Green street where she will in future receive her pupils. Mrs. Blanchard is a pupil of Madame Julie Rosewald of San Francisco, Lena Little of Boston and Oscar Saenger of New York, and created a very favorable impression in her artistic recital work given on her return from abroad not long since.

H. B. Pasmore gave a "Talk on Singing," a subject upon which he is most enthusiastic, before an audience at the First Unitarian church, Oakland, on Thursday with illustrations by his pupils. —The Music Critic.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff, vs. William Henry Weston, Defendant. } Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

Too Bad to be Read

The reading committee of the Boston Free Library is either fated to do things which will keep it before the public, or else the "literary" ladies of which it is composed are bidding for free ads., which they may be mistaking for fame. Early last year they leaped into notoriety by giving out a list of books which they refused to place on the shelves, and amongst them were not only some which were popular favorites of the hour, but many of permanent value, and all of them were at least innocuous. I am now informed that "Esther Waters" is to be kept in a locked case. The funny part of it is that "The Confessions of a Young Man," by the same author, can be had for the asking. The "Confessions" is, to say the least, frankly salacious, while the other, though realistic and sad enough, is as moral as a novel can be, if repentance and long expiation for ill-doing count for anything. "Esther Waters" was a servant girl, and that may account for the aristocratic discrimination, but as the book is not a new one as new books go nowadays, there should be no necessity for putting it into quarantine at this late day. Moreover, any one who has any curiosity about its contents can purchase a copy for a nickel.

Pidgin and the Committee

Not long ago "Blennerhassett" offended the committee's squeamishness. Mr. Pidgin has not seen fit to gloss over, ignore or deny certain traits in the character of Burr, and the good ladies, in petticoats or without them, are troubled lest the "young people" who might come into possession of the volume should go astray for lack of a guide post. There is no express and specific arraignment of Burr's morals, and no moralizing, and the nice little girls and boys of twenty or more, in and around Boston, are so used to leading strings and nurse maids that they cannot be trusted to know of themselves what is right or wrong. "Blennerhassett" has been admitted to the library with many misgivings, and only because it was pointed out to the committee that if they persisted in their action of exclusion the whole country would see nothing but narrowness and prejudice, and declare they were actuated solely by a sort of spite to the memory of Burr, and unwillingness to consider a new view of a historical question. No doubt but what libraries might profit by proper censorship, but the censoring should be applied more to the class of books which may pass into incompetent hands, rather than to those which find their way to the shelves. This fidgeting over the precious "young person" and its morals and mental manners savors more of mollycoddling and meddling than of any serious purpose. If the preachers who form a large percentage of that committee are doing their duty in their chosen fields, there should be no question in the minds of the patrons of the Boston library on the subject of plain morals as laid down in the ten commandments or any one of them. If there is anything so very reprehensible in "Blennerhassett," no one outside of Boston has yet suspected it, and if the book were not already one of the popular successes, one might see in this an attempt to create a boom.

Was Kim the Artful Dodger?

And now it has been discovered that Kipling found "Kim" in Dickens, and some one has kindly pointed out a prototype of each character in the older author. And because the Thibetan Lama is content and cheerful, and accepts life as he found it, lo and behold! he is not Oriental at all, but decidedly Occidental, and altogether unspeakable because he does not act in every instance according to the preconceived ideas of what an Oriental should do. Some day it will dawn upon the minds of these people who read only to be confirmed in such opinions as they may have formed, that others, and particularly writers of individuality and readers of independent minds, have no use for the commonplace. What one wants in a story or a romance is not the cut-and-dried certainty, but the unexpected and unusual. Ninety-nine out of a hundred lamas might have been quite as conventional as the ordinary type of preacher, but the hundredth one, the exception, is what makes him interesting. Kim may bear some resemblance to Fagin's graceless protege, and he decidedly is unlike the ordinary street Arab, but it is just the unlikeness that makes him what he is and worthy to be written about. The Lama may suggest to some minds the Cheeryble brothers, but the people who appear to have read Dickens and nothing else and to subject every book that falls into their hands to an analysis and comparison, in the hope that they may catch some one napping, have about as much knowledge of reading and the purpose thereof as another of Dickens' characters, honest but illiterate Joe Gargery: "Give me a good book or a good newspaper, and sit me down afore a good fire, and I ask no better. Lord! when you DO come to a J and an O, and says you, 'Here at last, is a J-O, Joe,' how interesting reading is!"

Wanted, a New Ad for Marie

It is a poor week when Marie Corelli has not a grievance to air. Anything or nothing will afford her an excuse for flying into print and demanding that she be let alone. It is hard to take Marie seriously, for if she really desires the personal oblivion which she professes to demand so ardently, it ought to occur to her that she might attain it by the simple process of subsiding for a week or so. At the end of that time her name and her novels alike would become back numbers with little hope or danger of resurrection. Her latest tirade occupies a column in the London Chronicle, and she concludes it by begging the editor to give her a "talisman of protection against this wholly undesired, vulgar and objectionable notoriety." Since the Corelli evidently will not keep silence, it might serve the purpose equally well if editors would take her at her word and suppress her communications, which have been kept up so long and in such a monotonous key of complaining that they have become like the ticking of a clock, no longer heeded even if heard. What Marie needs just now is some new style of advertisement.

Not an Author's Paradise

Bucharest cannot be regarded as a paradise for authors, since it is reported that two of the best known writers have recently opened beer saloons in order to support themselves. Caragaiti, one of the first novelists and playwrights, was recently called before the curtain of one of the local theatres and roundly applauded. He responded in a speech in which he thanked the audience for their enthusiasm, but frankly told them he could not live on it, and it would be more to the purpose if they would make a pilgrimage to his place of business on the opposite side of the street. The report further stated that the hint was taken and the place of refreshment liberally patronized. —The Bookworm.

SAN FRANCISCO, DEC. 24, 1900

DR. WONG WOO,

To all whom it may concern: In December, 1899, I was taken sick with Black Typhoid Fever, the most virulent type known to medical science. I had hemorrhages both nasal and intestinal, eight of the latter occurring in one day. Dr. Wong Woo, eminent Chinese physician, who called and with one dose of his tea stopped the flow of blood, thereby saving my life, as I had been given up by my white physician, as well as by all my friends. Was unconscious four weeks, but by Dr. Wong Woo's wonderful skill he saved my life from this most fatal of all fevers. Although I was confined to my bed three months, was able to resume my vocation in six months from the time I went to bed, and now I weigh 202 pounds, more than I ever attained previously. I would cheerfully recommend Dr. Wong Woo to any one in need of a first-class physician for any cause whatsoever.

The Literary Langue

["Let him commence his reform of the common speech by saying, 'Alas, no!' at a dinner table, and watch results."—From an editorial, "The Literary and the Vulgar Speech," Bulletin, January second.]

I.

Scene.—Dining room of Mrs. Brown-Smarten's town-house, during progress of formal dinner. Party of sixteen, including hostess.

Miss Robinson (to her tete-atete): Are you fond of golf, Mr. Jones?

Mr. Jones: Alas, no!

Miss R.: And why alas?

Mr. J.: Because if I were a golf-player, I would be more popular with your sex.

Miss R. thinks this very witty and resolves to use the idea later herself.

Miss R.'s lefthand neighbor: Do you like champagne?

Miss R.: Alas, no!

Her neighbor: Alas?

Miss R.: Yes, certainly. If I were, more men would ask me out to dinner.

As her lefthand neighbor is impecunious, but very much epris in Miss R.'s direction, he takes mental note of her dislike to expensive wine and resolves to invite her to the theatre next week.

Result: Two points scored by "Alas, no!"—Mr. Jones gets a reputation for wit and Miss Robinson gets an invitation to the theatre.

II.

Scene.—Miss Robinson's drawing-room during the progress of an afternoon tea. Bevy of buds assisting hostess to receive.

Mrs. Pacific-Avenue (to Mrs. Nob-Hill): This is the third tea I've been to this afternoon.

Mrs. Nob-Hill: How charming! I dote on teas, don't you?

Mrs. P.-A.: Alas, no! I'm bored to death and hungry, too. I hate tea and have drunk three cups.

Mrs. Nob-Hill makes mental note of the latest thing in exclamations and introduces it at the next reception she goes to that day.

Second result attained by Mr. Jones' masterpiece: "Alas, no!" is made fashionable.

people who catch on to the latest wrinkles in modern phraseology are interjecting, "Alas, no!" into their conversation. It is a sort of a password to the inner circle to give the exclamation the correct inflection. And if you can't say, "Alas, no!" with the charming little shrug and lifted eye-brow that accompany it, you are stamped as not of the elite.

IV.

Extract from learned article by Professor Clevah Uptodate, in the Scientific Tri-monthly: There appears to be rapidly approaching the period when the speech of our grandmothers' time will be in common use. Already that little interjection, "Alas!" is being used in every-day conversation by the cultured man and woman, and this portends an approach to the more precise speech that we find in the old-time novels, those of Jane Austin, for instance. This change is decidedly for the better. What is vulgarly termed "slang," the tongue to which our beautiful mother language had deteriorated, is apparently to be superseded by the fine sentences that were in general use fifty years ago. This improvement will be far-reaching in its results. With the language of precision, more courteous manners will be the rule, and with better manners will come better morals.

The Fiend's Creation

From out the bank of gross deceit
The devil took a clod,
And fashioned it in human shape,
To imitate his God.

He wet the clay with silly pride
And sprinkled it with lust,
And seasoned it with whimperings
To form the outer crust;

Compressed it close with selfishness
And molded it with strife,
Then touched it up with petulance
And called the thing to life.

The devil laughed aloud in glee
To see this semblance human,
And cried: "The meanest creature yet
Is mine, all mine, a woman!"

SUMMONS IN DIVORCE

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Department No. 5

FLORENCE G. TILTON, Plaintiff
vs.
CHARLES O. TILTON, Defendant

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:
CHARLES O. TILTON, Defendant

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the grounds of defendant's wilful neglect and wilful desertion of plaintiff also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 30th day of October in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and one.

[SEAL.] WM. A. DEANE, Clerk.

OUR OPINION

New Parental School

Chicago has grappled with the truancy problem by opening a parental school. It is a pedagogic experiment to wean youngsters from the constitutional truant habit and force them to become faithful in their school attendance. The advocates of the scheme insist that "truancy is the kindergarten of crime," and that a child graduate of the parental school is a criminal saved from the penitentiary. The new school is not for delinquents or defendants: it is for truants and incorrigibles. The habitual truant frequently becomes the delinquent, and the delinquent becomes the hardened criminal of the future. The average number of truants each month in Chicago is five hundred. Of this number two hundred are habitual truants, and of the habitual truants forty per cent are delinquents. There has always been a place to commit the delinquent, but not the habitual truants. Hence, in order to check habitual truants before they become delinquents the parental school is inaugurated. According to its founders it will be neither paradise nor purgatory. It will be a first-class corrective institution, with fairness and patience to all, with malice and mistreatment toward none. It will be equipped with teachers to direct the heart as well as the head; who will attend to the moral as well as intellectual uplift of the children committed. The new institution deprives the child of its liberty by a system of discipline and vigilance, instead of bolts and bars of frowning iron. It is not a prison. It is a school for the confinement, discipline and instruction and maintenance of children of compulsory school age who may be committed there, who are habitual truants from the public schools, or who persistently violate the rules of the public schools after repeated efforts have been made by patient principals and patient teachers to reform them. There will be a system of parole which will safeguard overcrowding, which will be an auxiliary to its reform methods. In accordance with the parental school law "no religious instruction shall be given in this school" by teachers in the classroom, but the superintendent shall so arrange that the children may receive religious instruction "in accordance with the belief of their parents." Every parental creed will be respected. Every parent may visit his or her child regularly during the terments, however, will be permitted to use this school as an ent in the reformation of the child, although home ties may be temporarily severed to attain the desired betterment and advancement of that child's life. No parents, however, will be permitted to us this school as an institution of convenience to board and clothe their children, or to get rid of them. Petitions to admit children to the new school will be filed in court by the compulsory education department. The Chicago experiment is being watched with great interest.

Startling Discovery of a Tennessee Genius

A hustling Tennessee embalmer has discovered a new solution for preserving bodies after death. No ordinary preservative this, for his results far surpass the lean and leathern products of the Egyptian artists in mummies. The chef d'oeuvres they have left us look as if they had been put through a tannery or treated with some repugnant astringent. Their process, like the methods of our new dental surgery, may have been warranted to be without pain to the recipient, but certainly the lugubrious specimens bequeathed us sadly lack in one highly important particular—there is nothing life-like or natural in their appearance. That is the very point bragged about by this nascent Tennessee genius: he guarantees to preserve the subject in "a perfectly natural pose." There is no shenannigan about his claim, either, for he has tried it on a dog. Forty days ago the visage of that dog was made glad by the sight of a succulent piece of sausage meat which was dangled before his delighted nose. Instantly he was shot full of this mysterious embalming dope and since the fatal yelp he hasn't budged a hair's breadth from his "natural life-like expression." The confident Tennesseean is willing to give a written guarantee that that dog will wear the identical gladsome, sausage-welcoming expression 4,867,364 years hence. According to his claim nothing can shake that dog's "life-like expression" but the weakening of the dope that bolsters it, and that is figured out "to beat perpetual motion to a standstill." Which brings us to another remarkable advantage this new spring opening style in mummies will have over last year's museum bargain counter remnants from Egyptian tombs. It appears that the new liquid petrifies the body and the duration of this petrifaction depends upon the dilution of the embalming fluid. Guarantees will be furnished any inquisitive applicant that if he will submit to be pumped full of the magical preservative in its A. I. strength he will be billed to adorn this mortal sphere in "a perfectly natural pose" till the last chip is blasted from under him by whatever angelic trust has the contract of removing this earth from the universe. Fix a "look pleasant, please" expression on any man and give him an outside and inside needle-spray of the mixture and the Recording Angel, aeons hence, will be able to identify him and his expression without any birth certificate or Union Trust label. What a field this offers to the speculative mind. Fancy County Clerk Mahoney shot full of this dope just as he was solemnly assuring Bob Fitzgerald, Oscar Tolle and McElroy that their jobs were safe. There would be no gainsaying his petrified expression. Even the organization would have to admit that he must have committed himself. Gage, posed by an artistic embalmer, with the look he wore when he succeeded in compromising the late strike would be something beaming for future generations to gaze at. So would Henry Scott, posed with the expression he wore when he receipted the bill for the expenses of the President's visit. What priceless works of art depicting the life of our times this new discovery offers to transmit to posterity. For example, Master-of the Hounds Carolan arrayed in all his glittering regalia, with his proud lips pursed as if to shout, "Hark away!"as he lashes his good steed forward in the Blingum hunt; what a chef d'oeuvre this Tennesseean might make out of him for some suburban graveyard. And Ed. Greenway, in swallow-tail and pumps, poised like Mercury tip-toed on some heaven-kissing mount, or any similar pose which would show what he was like when leading the Friday Night cotillon. Fancy the 400 four hundred centuries hence gazing on such an inspiriting expression of our time. The world has waited too long for this Tennessee genius and his discovery. He should have hastened along several centuries ago and got in some of his deadly work for our benefit. What wouldn't we give to have Buckley's solid nine filled with this precious dope and lined up on pedestals along the wall of the Board of Supervisors' room in "perfectly natural poses." Such an exhibition would teach more than precepts in art to the studious taxpayer. Then there are shoals of others who would lose nothing under a similar treatment—unless it was their easy minds. True, the dailies claim that several of our well-known citizens have been in a petrified state for years and have simply stood around in silurian fashion blocking the city's improvement and progress. But the time must perforce come when such moss-covered conservatives will be rendered into dust and thin air, leaving no sign of their "life-like" expressions. Hail this Tennessee genius, then, who promises to squirt round his magic dope and transform our prize citizens into immutable mummies "as good as life" for the rabble of all time to rubber at.

Divorce on the Increase

The divorce habit is increasing all over the world. Recent statistics show that the United States is far in advance of all other nations in this respect. In Scotland the increase is climbing faster than population. In 1891 the land of the bonny briar bush furnished one hundred and forty-three cases; by 1901 the number had swelled to two hundred and six. During the same period population increased eleven per cent, while during the latter part of the decade the divorce mania shot up more than forty per cent. This is the high water mark for Europe but it is little more than a wavelet as compared with the divorce flood that sweeps over some States of the Union. For instance, between 1882-86 Scotland had a population of some 700,000 more people than Illinois, yet in that period the absolute number of divorces granted there was three hundred and ninety. During the same years the Illinois figures ran up to nearly twelve thousand. At that time Illinois led the States in the number of divorces, but not in percentages. During the twenty years of 1867-86 the yearly average per 100,000 of the population was as follows for the States named: Utah, 170; Colorado, 152; Oregon, 98; Rhode Island, 89; California, 87; New Hampshire, 75; Connecticut, 74; Maine, 67; Indiana, 67; Michigan, 66; Illinois, 64. And during the shorter period, 1881-86, there were several States in which the ratio of divorces to population was much greater than it was in Illinois. Among European countries Switzerland, Denmark and Germany rank high in the divorce lists, while Ireland is way at the bottom. But all Europe makes a small showing by comparison with the United States. For the years 1882-86 117,311 divorces were granted in the United States, whereas the number in Europe, with its immensely greater population, was only 85,100.

The Road to Good Reading

Those "best book" lists which the big publishing houses have lately become so fond of issuing in the form of bulletins are productive of much sapient comment on reading and its votaries. In sarcastically referring to the enormous sales of a recent popular novel one of the critics was led to remark, "Pliny says that it is well to read much, but not many things; our modern vice is to read too many things, and yet not much. After we have read much—that is to say, after we have grounded ourselves in the soundest culture, we are free, if we like, to read many things." This, in a nutshell, is the advice of the cultured mind the world over. The ideal training in books and reading is, for a few years, to live strictly with the classics. Stick to your Bible, your Shakespeare, Homer, Dante, Milton and such immortals. After such a course one is qualified to make excursions into the realms of lesser lights without imperiling the judgment or wasting mental stamina. There is also a correspondingly less danger that the great tide of printed froth let loose by the publishers in all sorts of novel guises will tempt your taste. There is too little nourishment for the properly reared mind in the average book of the day. The reader who does not strive to keep up with the inane chatter on the "latest thing in literature" may safely ignore it. Not until a book has proved itself by time nd in the proper quarters does it deserve a place on the book shelves. Any reader who has been raised on the best books, the classics of any literature, instinctively knows this. More, too, he acquires a rare time-s·ving judgment for perusing "the latest light literature." A glance through the pages of the last novel will give him a comprehensive idea of the whole book; for in such matter there is little meat to digest and no unusual demands are made on the judgment. That is why light and lazy minds go pleasuring by losing themselves in the amazing pages of such books: there is no effort demanded of the idle, drifting mentalities. But the active mind, in order to find enjoyment, demands a book that will exercise its powers and quicken the faculties.

The Saunterer

Reported Engaged to a Princess

The choicest tidbit of gossip that seasoned the week's tea tables was the news that Louis Bruguiere is engaged to a princess. Moral: "Young man, go East." For Louis' social halo here was as the sputtering of a candle compared to the limelight of popularity he has bathed in at Newport and in New York. First it was May Van Alen, of Astor forbears, who looked so kindly on the San Francisco youth that Mrs. Grundy held her breath and looked wise. However, the affair never ripened into a solitaire, and matrimonial wiseacres hung a "To Let" sign on Louis' heart. But unless Rumor has "got 'em again" this latest cardiac bulletin is authentic and the princess is a real live creature of flesh and blue blood. Whether she be Russian, Italian, French or Prussian is not yet known. Just the tantalizing fact that he is engaged to a princess has floated out here in a private letter, and even putting this and that together does not spell the name of the aristocratic unknown. So local society is sitting on the settee of impatience and waiting for further news.

Throwing Him Life Preservers

Louis' plunge into the New York swim has kept Mamma B. busy throwing out life-preservers in the shape of ducats. Of course, he must live up to the exaggerated wealth Newport society credits him with possessing, and the family purse is not overbulging in consequence. It is to be hoped that the titled lady of his choice is gilt-edged as well as blue-blooded, for Louis' individual slice of the Brugiere wealth will not "butter parsnips" fit for a princess. So if his princess is not financially above par, who'll pay the piper? Peter Martin might offer a suggestion.

Dissensions Among Native Daughters

I am sorry to hear these stories of strife and dissatisfaction that are circulating among the Native Daughters. The discontent should be settled before the big annual gathering here in June else that affair is likely to prove anything but the usual big success. The splendid organization has won too warm a place in the hearts of its admirers and staunch supporters for its future to be jeopardized by the jealousies of a few ambitious members and malcontents. I cannot credit most of the stories floating about regarding "rebellion" in the organization and attribute them rather to vehement feelings over differences of opinion which might be effaced by calm discussion. For instance, I feel sure that the charge that the constitution has been flagrantly violated can be easily settled by referring it to the proper committee; likewise, the claim that a number of illegal acts have been committed by autocratic and ambitious officers. The minutes of the Parlors in question submitted to a proper court of inquiry ought to quietly and satisfactorily determine such charges without resort to such threats as "impeachment," "disruption," "disgraced the order," and wilder outbursts. Prudence, fairness and foresight have so long been the mainstay of those directing the affairs of the order that they assuredly guarantee justice to any and all appealing dissatisfied members.

Heart Burning Charges

Certainly if the dissatisfied Daughters would appeal to the proper powers they could get a fair hearing of the charge that the interior Parlors are rebellious because they are taxed too heavily for the big affairs to be held in the city. But it seems like an exhibition of personal feelings when some vehement members declare that the Grand President, when she visits interior Parlors, carries along tickets on the sofa cushions which she is raffling off to raise money for her pet plan—the Home for Native Daughters. Certainly if tickets, in bunches of twenty-five, to the "Buena Vista" Parlor minstrel show were sent to the interior Parlors by an "influential" officer in the order, the solicited Parlor didn't have to buy them. There is no call on disgruntled members to further declare that they have had work enough to get along without being bled in this fashion, and they certainly betray animosity when they add that they don't care to support the Home because it gives signs of being simply a boarding house run by a close corporation of self-empowered aristocrats, which is "of the order but not in it."

Why not Settle It Amicably?

Assuredly the charge that all sorts of efforts are being made to name new Parlors so that a Genevieve Baker Parlor may be foisted on the State by the present administration ought to be quietly and calmly settled in the order without blazoning it to the world. Certainly if votes are being solicited for its charter by influential officers as a "special favor" the voters are in no way bound to consent to their request. If the discontented Daughters would prefer their charges that gambling and other questionable methods were being used at some of the fairs to raise money for the big celebration in June it would surely receive careful consideration and the question would be settled without bitter accusations and criminations. As it is the charge is simply handed about the Parlors, creating heart burnings and lessening the chances of a calm and easy settlement of the differences.

Engraved Wedding Announcements and Invitations

Troubles of an Unhappy Novelist

Friends here of Mrs. Stephen Townsend, better known the world over as Mrs. Frances Burnett, the novelist, have received letters to the effect that she is going to sue for a divorce from her husband. Mrs. Burnett's marriage less than a year ago to Mr. Townsend was bitterly opposed by her relatives and friends. She was some years older than he. After her divorce from her first husband, Mr. Burnett, fourteen years ago, she led a retired life with her little son Lionel, the original of "Little Lord Fauntleroy." It was the life of her choice and the most congenial to her literary pursuits. Her friends realized better than she did what an interruption by marriage meant to a woman of her temperament. Their chief objection to Townsend, however, was his character. He was an actor and they didn't think him of a nature to appreciate Mrs. Burnett's refined qualities. Notwithstanding the disparity in their ages Mrs. Burnett became deeply smitten with him when they first met abroad several years ago. The romance was helped considerably by the sudden illness of Lionel. Mr. Townsend made himself indispensable at the time and Mrs. Burnett became greatly impressed with his attachment to the little fellow. The understanding between them ripened to such an extent that when they reached London Mrs. Burnett backed Townsend in a theatrical venture to the extent of ten thousand dollars. But Townsend didn't succeed as an actor and when Mrs. Burnett returned to New York he followed her. Her friends easily guessed the way things were drifting and begged her not to marry the man but the actor's influence proved the stronger and about a year later their engagement was announced.

Divorce Imperative

Relatives and friends redoubled their efforts to block the wedding but Townsend was again victorious. To escape all this home discussion and opposition the doting couple arranged that Mrs. Burnett should go abroad. Townsend followed her later and they were married in Genoa. That was last March, less than a year ago. For a time they lived in a romantic bower in rural England. Within two months the anxious friends here began to receive letters hinting at great unhappiness. Her sister, Mrs. Jordan, was sent over to see if matters could not be straightened out, but she quickly decided that the husband was such an obnoxious person and so grossly abusive that only divorce could mend the trouble. So the elderly novelist was brought back to New York and turned over to the care of close and comforting friends, under whose protecting wing she will remain hereafter.

Has Joined the Philistines

Amadee Joullin, who always extolled art for art's sake and scorned the dollars of the rich, has forsaken his idol. He is to paint a Last Spike picture for the Northern Pacific railroad. He will work in the figures of Grant, Villard and other great men, life-size, upon a background of snow and ice and mountains. What does this portend? It can scarcely be credited among the art students who so long looked upon Joullin as the apostle of art, true art as opposed to commercial painters. But there seems no doubt that Amadee has accepted the commission.

Thomas Hill's "Last Spike"

It is to be hoped that Joullin's "Last Spike" effort will be better appreciated than was Tom Hill's. Hill painted a huge canvas commemorating the driving of the last spike for the first trans-continental railway. The painting was ordered by Senator Stanford, who requested that his figure be given prominence over the others. Also by his orders certain men who were present at the last spike ceremony were omitted from the picture. Hill worked hard to please his patron and followed out his wishes to the letter, anticipating a payment that would handsomely cover all his outlay of time and energy. But when the painting was finished, the men whose figures were left out made vigorous protest and Stanford, rather than explain the reason of the omission, said that he never ordered the picture at all. This surprising declaration was a great blow to Hill whose work thus all went for nothing and it was long before he rallied from the disappointment and physical illness which followed.

Forgot His Wine Cards

The promoters of the big charity ball at the Palace hotel had a very lively half hour's "financial fidget" when the balances were struck. It all came about through the forgetfulness of the committeeman who handled the tap of the champagne that was to flood the supper and bring in a corresponding stream of five-dollar pieces. Great hopes were entertained by the promoters of the affair that the sale of wine at the supper would add a very handsome sum to the receipts. They were positive of this when they saw the enthusiastic way the wine was ordered. At first the diners appeared a bit shy but after the first bottles were opened and circulated there seemed to be a concerted and irresistible rush to order more wine. It popped and gurgled on all sides. Some of the managers wondered what could have induced several well-known parsimonious society men to suddenly become so lavish in ordering wine—that is, they wondered till some one asked how high the figures on the wine cards reached. Then it was discovered that Committeeman Mountford Wilson had forgotten the highly important detail of sending out blank wine cards with each bottle of wine: accordingly there was no certain tab on the guests who had ordered it. The guests themselves had early discovered this oversight, though it is more than probable that most of them thought that as there were no menu cards the wine must be free; hence the reckless way in which it was ordered. The agent's bill was something over three hundred dollars. Of course the matter was satisfactorily settled after a halfhour's very nervous conference and—well, the committee wasn't out of pocket and charity received a nice little sum from the general receipts of the ball.

Society Belles in—Ahems!

The story of a "stag" dinner given recently with society maids and matrons in male attire decorating the feast, has just oozed through the wall of secrecy the merry party built around their revelry. The dinner was given in the home of a Pacific avenue matron who has two daughters almost ready to bud into society, but they were pronounced too young and verdant for the stag dinner and trundled off to bed. Not even the ever-green mother-in-law of the hostess was present, but the explanation was offered that "Peter's were too long and Walter's too narrow," and, as male attire was de rigueur, at the last minute she had to phone regrets. However there were eight spirited skirtless dames and damsels present who achieved motley masculine make-up—an Uncle Sam, a pair of clowns, a trio of Willie-boys, and Tommy Atkins. The girls in conventional dress suits looked the real thing—from the waist up. Lovely woman is hopelessly feminine, after all. Tommy Atkins would never have been mistaken for the charming bride whose recent marriage was a very smart affair, but an ill-fitting moustache was responsible for that. If there were not a picture on record to tell the tale I would not credit her with such shapely ahems! They had an awfully jolly time and they solemnly joined hands and agreed to keep the lark so deep and dark that it would never by any mischance reach the ears of "horrid editors" who make "copy" out of everything. They have guarded their secret better than their brothers—which is a word to the wise.

Men Must Go Unmasked

Perhaps the committee that rules the Mardi Gras ball is right in again deciding for "No masks for the men." The artists and students say this is all wrong, but as it is not the artists and students who make the ball a financial success, the committee appears to have reason on its side. Before society formally passed judgment and decided that the Mardi Gras balls at the Hopkins Institute were a proper function to attend the committee in spite of their very best efforts could not make them a success. The Art Association lost money on them right along. But last year and the year before several wings of society took up the ball with vigor and attended in such numbers as to outshine the artistic and lesser lights. True, the real carnival spirit was lacking, but that was not owing to the fact that the men were unmasked. It was rather due to the absence of the stuff that cheers. Those who came with anything like a lively carnival spirit acquired it on the way to the ball.

Success of Three Dowerless Beauties

Mrs. Adam Grant went East last Saturday with her husband. She was hostess at a tea a few days before her departure, Mrs. Joe Grant receiving with her. The latter is the best of friends with the former, and there are few families where mother-in-law and daughter-in-law agree so well. But both are women with very good-natured and congenial traits of character. Mrs. Adam Grant is one of the most interesting women of the early California regime. Like others of her time she was a dowerless beauty when wooed and won by Adam Grant, the man of wealth and position. Her mother, Mrs. Gummer, kept a boarding-house in the days when the waters of the bay came up to Montgomery street. Emma (Mrs. Grant) was the prettiest of her three daughters, one of whom married Bob Morrow and one became the wife of William Harney.

at the southwest corner of Vallejo and Fillmore streets; it is well adapted for crushes such as this is sure to be. There has been rather a flutter among those invited as to the proper thing to wear, evening clothes not being de rigueur until six under any conditions, and seven is the dinner hour nowadays of the elite. Ned Greenway in his Glory

The Greenway dance was a great success and Ned is walking around in a trance of delight. Just at present he would rather be himself than Emperor William. In the old Greenway days he was so sure of his divine right to the throne that he was rather catholic in his tastes. I have heard well brought-up girls say that they couldn't get on with him because they preferred to choose their hand-squeezing partners. In preparing for his new reign Greenway gave out that he had lost his old list and would have to make out a new one. That meant that no one could say he or she was crossed off. Names were simply omitted through—well, carelessness. Every one who had offended the Prince during his exile was 'forgotten," that is, if he could afford it, for even Greenways remember injuries. However, there were many whom he could not afford to "forget," and they were all there smiling ironically at him. There were many sad, broken hearts that wept out their grief while the gay remembered ones triumphantly danced the hours away. But the blue-penciling—inexorable as it was—was one of the main causes of Greenway's success. Like a true leader on the field of the cloth of gold he knows the value of no memory.

Will Return a Bride

I hear that Alec von Schroeder and Mrs. Cutter are married and are on their way here. Presently we shall learn of the young baron's resignation from the army for the Kaiser decreed long ago that none of his officers may marry divorcees and retain their commissions. Mrs. Cutter went abroad on the same steamer with the two barons last year, the Deutschland. En route the husband of Mrs. Cutter's friend died. Now she comes back a bride.

The Mayor Scored a Union Point

The Symphony Society managed at each of its concerts to give the audience something to talk about beside the music. At the last concert it was Mayor Schmitz. He was ushered into the box that ex-Mayor Phelan occupied during the grand opera season, and though an interesting musical number was under way, the audience's attention immediately switched from Mozart to the Mayor. He took a front seat and did not appear to object to being the cynosure of feminine eyes. Later he made a little speech by which he secured a lot of applause and cemented the affection of the Musicians' Union. But the speech was a decided play to the gallery. As an example of spread-eagleism it equaled in some particulars the flamboyant flight of a robust Fourth of July orator. Mr. Schmitz said that our symphony orchestra was as good as any in the world. Now, Mr. Steindorff's men are doing their level best to approach a high standard, but they still fall far short of the work done here by previous symphony orchestras. It will be some time before they reach the altitude of their local predecessors. Though the men themselves liked the bouquet, their intelligence rejected it. Mr. Schmitz should think before he speaks.

Steindorff's Lack of Dash

One of the local critics claims that Steindorff is too timid. He would be a more successful leader if he let himself go occasionally. It is too early in the season to speak dogmatically about the leader's proficiency or deficiency. He is too new to the work for one to expect him to be a perfect reader and leader. What Steindorff seems to lack is dash, but occasionally this quality crops up in him, as in the Von Reznicek overture last Friday. Like all Germans, he is best in works that call for sentiment and poetry. In Wagner's "Traume" he brought out all the delicate shades of meaning to a nicety. Of all the conductors that our symphony orchestras have had, Scheel was the best. But even Scheel was not so inspiring as Arditi, Walter Damrosch or Seppilli.

Identity of the "Lone Horsewoman"

The photograph of the Genthe exhibit at the Mark Hopkins Institute that attracted most attention was called "The Challenge," and public opinion was undecided as to whether the original was Fritzi Scheff or Margaret Anglin. Both names have been given, but the features are really those of Miss Doris Jeffrey who attracted so much attention at San Rafael last summer by her excellent riding. Her parents have come back from Alaska and she is living quietly out in the Western Addition. For several months she has ridden in the Park every afternoon and usually alone. She became known to frequenters there as the "lone horsewoman." Her beauty of course quickly attracted attention and a number of interested swells persisted in making searching inquiries till they learned the identity of the woman who made such a beautiful picture on horseback.

Most ladies hold the reins well. Perhaps it is not bad that they do.

Has Fluttered the Smart Set

Kate Clement has raised the ghost of the famous Fithian yachting trip by declaring at a recent smart dinner that she has half made up her mind to write the story of that spicy jaunt. I fear Mistress Kate spoke rashly for I "hae me doots" about the tale even dripping from her pen. What torrid reading that cruise in the Southern Seas would make! If Miss Clement wishes to incarnadine yellow-back fiction she certainly has plenty of material, but it is likely to remain safely pigeon-holed in her own highly colored memory of the affair. Not even to her intimates has Kate Clement told all that happened when she went a-yachting with the Fithians. If Miss Clement wouldn't stand for the way things went on the cruise there is probably not a girl in the smart set who could; she is of the cult that does not pretend the innocence which is only ignorance wrong side out. She confessed as much to Madame Eames-Story at the Holbrook dinner. "Why, even the Parisiennes don't bite too deep into the apple of knowledge," answered the surprised prima donna. Like her friend Mrs. Joe Tobin, Miss Clement adopts the long, lean and sinuous effects. At the Phelan dinner Miss Clement was dazzling in a wonderful gown that had so little to support it in the way of shoulder straps, that the mystery of how it ever stayed "put" is as great as that which veils the famous yachting trip.

Lamenting over Casserly's Fall

Society is mildly incensed over the way some of the papers have handled Jack Casserly's forced resignation from the Board of Education. According to those who take the same brand and are therefore qualified to speak, Mr. Casserly's deviations from the path of strict sobriety are not nearly so vivid as they have been painted. His own set find him a genial, witty comrade, even ready to strum a tune or string a story; those outside the pale pronounce him a strutting cad, pompous and self-important. Perhaps Alice Rix most neatly condensed this estimate of him when she wrote him down for Jack Asserly. Casserly, as the son-in-law of Cudahy, the millionaire pork-packer of Chicago, ought to be able to light his cigars with the paltry three thousand dollar salary which he drew as a school director, but unfortunately Cudahy pere will never be traced by the shekels he has scattered Casserly's way.

His Brilliant Marriage

When Jack Casserly married Celia Cudahy it was considered the most brilliant marriage that any San Franciscan had made, not excepting Frank Carolan's marriage with Miss Pullman. Archbishop Riordan has always been credited with this match, for he first introduced the young people. Papa Cudahy saw to it that the wedding went off with the flourish befitting his pork profits and then sent the happy couple on their way with his blessing, but evidently did not embarrass them with riches. As blessings are not interest-bearing and productive only of debts, the Jack Casserlys have never been able to splurge but have lived very modestly in the Casserly family home in Buchanan street. Mrs. Casserly and her daughter, Marguerite, called "Daisy" by her intimates, also live there. Mrs. Jack Casserly does not attempt to entertain, but her charming manners and musical accomplishments make her a much-sought-after guest. She plays the harp exquisitely and touches the soul of that quaintly beautiful instrument as few amateurs can. Jack Casserly is himself a musician and though he does not belong to the Union, his friends feel Schmitz should have had a brotherly feeling for him on that score. Three thousand a year isn't much, but it was pumpkins to Casserly under the circumstances.

End of the Gashwiler Romance

A Panama steamer this week brings with her one disappointed woman, whose story is like unto that of Pauline's in Bulwer's great drama, "The Lady of Lyons." This is the Senora Robledo, nee Lottie Gashwiler, whose wedding some few months ago with Senor Don Robledo of Guatemala was one of the social events of the year. Senor Robledo was represented to be a second Monte Cristo in wealth, and it was plain to see that his social accomplishments were legion. Like Claude Melnotte, the fascinating Guatemalan breathed glowing descriptions of the magnificent splendor of his Central American home into the willing ears of Miss Gashwiler. Letters and photographs were freely shown to substantiate his statements. So well he played his part that Miss Gashwiler, with the warmest approbation of her family, accepted him. A smart wedding followed, and the future seemed very rosy for the young couple.

Like Another Baron Munchausen

The story goes that the gay senor has proved to be a veritable Baron Munchausen, and the wealth of which he had spoken existed only in his lively imagination. His palace dwindled into nothing more than an adobe hacienda on a plantation many miles burro-back from the City of Guatemala, the only inhabitants for miles around being dirty peons and negroes. Life in such a place soon became intolerable to a girl who had been used to every luxury, and at the earnest solicitation of her family she returned. There will, in all probability, be no divorce, as the Gashwilers are devout Catholics. Another sister is married to Sam Shortridge.

Is Oelrichs in a Huff?

There was considerable comment because of the absence of Hermann Oelrichs from Mr. Phelan's smart dinner at the Palace. All the friends and connections of the Martins were asked and many thought it strange that Hermann Oelrichs as the uncle-to-be of Peter Martin was not there. Some one gave this explanation in an aside with the coffee. Some time before the dinner day Mr. Oelrichs tried very hard to sell the ex-Mayor a lot belonging to the Fair estate on Bush street. At that time Mr. Phelan was looking for land on which to build the library he afterwards presented to the city. He considered Mr. Oelrichs' proposition, concluded the price was too high and ultimately bought elsewhere. From that time to this Hermann Oelrichs has not spoken to him. The doctors, however, have promised the ex-Mayor that his present trip abroad will relieve him a great deal of this affliction.

Will Not Fight His Battles

Mrs. Lawrence Scott was present at the dinner which shows she does not intend to fight her father's battles for him. The idea is extravagant but there are gossips today who really believe that Mr. Crockett holds Mr. Phelan's reforms responsible for being out in the cold, cold world without a sheltering salary. Possibly it was the same set who once so industriously shuttlecocked the rumor that the President of the Gas company was using all his pull to bring about the ex-Mayor's social boycott.

Being Feted in the East

Mrs. Jimmy Robinson, who was so popular last winter as the chaperon of her young daughter, Elena Robinson, is not going out at all this winter. Miss Elena is being feted in Boston. Mr. and Mrs. Robinson went back to San Jose early in the season. Mr. Robinson is said to be in the last stages of consumption.

Bernhardt's Bogey Story

My Paris correspondent writes me that Sarah Bernhardt told this story the other afternoon at her house in the Parc Monceau quarter. It happened to her some weeks back while she was staying at her fortress in Belle Ile. She was sound asleep in her primitive bedroom when she suddenly woke with an uncanny feeling that there was somebody in the room. It was, she judged, about two o'clock in the morning; outside boomed the misty Atlantic and round the grey old fort moaned an unquiet wind. Sarah, who always keeps a light burning in her room, sat up in bed—there was somebody at the foot of her couch staring fixedly at her! She tried to call her maid, but her tongue refused to act. All she could do was to stare as if transfixed at her mysterious visitant. She described the apparition as an old, old woman with a pallid, strangely wrinkled face, out of which the piercing eyes shone weirdly. She was gowned in the antique costume of a long past day, and Bernhardt remembers noticing a curiously-set turquoise ring on one of the shadowy white hands. Suddenly the spell was removed and Sarah sprang out of bed, but the phantom, or whatever it was, had vanished into air. Bernhardt swears that she was not dreaming, and that she had not eaten anything particularly indigestible at dinner. "Usually I sleep comme un sabot," she said, "and it is very strange that I should so unexpectedly awake to see what I did." She told the tale to her friends in her most dulcet voice, and quite in her best manner; it made delicious little creeps run up and down the spines of her hearers. "It may have been a warning of some coming disaster," laughed Sarah. "Who knows? Still, what will be will be."

School Director Mark's Shrewd Trick

A curious scene was enacted in the office of School Director Kincaid on the day when she was "not" appointed. She had an engagement to transact some business with the teachers after school. After a wait she sent down word from her office that she could not appear, owing to a headache. At that moment the evening papers arrived and one of the teachers mounted a chair and read in loud tones, "Mary Kincaid Not to be Reappointed." The teachers all shook hands with each other and there was great rejoicing among those who had made a special fight against reappointment. Mrs. Kincaid has gone to Coronado to recuperate. I wonder if she has yet forgotten how she was thimble rigged out of three years of office by that gallant but astute Mr. Mark. In drawing lots for their terms it will be remembered Mrs. Kincaid drew the one year term, and Mark caught the two year term. Having been in office this diplomat foresaw that Mayor Phelan would still be in office when the one year expired and would probably re-appoint the holder. Accordingly he chivalrously offered to exchange his two year term for her one year term. Mrs. Kincaid thought him the nicest man she ever knew until the next day some one told her she had been cleverly jockeyed out of three years of office.

Here's a "Howdy Do" in Golf Circles

Golf games peppered with vocal tabasco are always in order when the ladies match their skill on the links. But of late the air has grown so leaden that nothing short of a thunderstorm will clarify the atmosphere. Already the rumbling, grumbling portents prove the tempest is brewing, and even a weather prophet with a crokery eye can read that it will be a record-breaker. Mrs. Gilman Brown is going to put up a silver cup and thereby hangs the tale of woe. Not a girl can be found who is willing to compete for the trophy. They all stoutly declare they will not play for it, and the cup may go a-begging or Mrs. Brown may play Mrs. Brown, for all they care. There are half a dozen players who would stand fair chances of winning out but they will not enter the lists, so here's a pretty solar plexus for true sport. The men are disgusted with the stand the women are taking and most of them wish the ladies would pack their brassies and play in their own back yards. Verbal fistics usually punctuate the women's tournaments and much hard feeling is generated. This is the first cup Mrs. Gilman Brown has offered, although she has won most of the trophies. The knockers have frequently polished their hammers on that score. "She evidently doesn't believe that it is more blessed to give than to receive," they scoffed.

Tart Comments on Her Offer

And now comes Mrs. Brown and offers a silver trophy, and they chorus: "We don't want your old cup." In common parlance this is the tactic known as "freeze-out" but the ladies should remember they are playing golf and accordingly not borrow from the ethics of their favorite card game. If Mrs. Brown is frozen out of golf her seconds will have equal chances, but as long as she plays she so far outdistances her competitors that she is in a class by herself and all the prizes come her way. When the San Francisco team went over to play the Oaklands last week, Mrs. Brown did her strenuous best to save the home team from defeat but they were beaten, largely owing to the off-game put up by Caro Crockett Scott, who was feeling ill. Miss Scott really dragged herself from a sick bed to fill her place on the team, and her playing sagged far below her usual standard. However it was the right spirit and it is a pity that all the club members are not "game" to a finish. Certainly their treatment of Mrs. Brown is not according to Hoyle. This cup episode will be a target for the finger of derision unless the women golfers come to their senses and play a "gentlemanly" game.

Cupid on a Quiet Hunt

Reports of two engagements are buzzing in the air: that of one of this season's debutantes, Pearl Landers and young Dr. Gibbons. They are looking unutterable things at each other and rumor has it they are saying them. The other couple whom the gossips are trying to marry off are Margaret Salisbury and young Baldwin. Miss Salisbury is genuinely popular and made her debut three years ago.

Maud Berri's Return

Society greeted Maude Berri's return. There was a big batch of Bohemian club men in the front rows of the theatre—Ned Greenway, Joe Howell, Colonel Trumbo and others. Mrs. Joe Tobin, Miss Spreckels and Jennie Blair were in a box party. Miss Blair wore her favorite gray; Mrs. Tobin, her black spangled frock. Across the theatre were the Tom Williams' and a box party. The Fulton Berrys were in a loge, and the handsome Princess Chic's little daughter was a witness, wide-eyed and happy, of her mother's triumph. She is a very pretty child with long light curls and a fair skin. She was dressed all in pink, with a pink bow in her hair and pink satin shoes on her tiny feet. What interested me particularly in that audience was the presence of so many elderly men, men apparently not of the usual theatre-going crowd. These were the social, business and political friends of Fulton Berry, the Fresno raisin grower. Many of them had dandled little Maude Berry on their knees when she was of the age of her own little daughter, and none of them would have missed seeing the debut of "Fulton Berry's little girl."

Society Tackles the Tiger

My Seattle correspondent writes:

Spokane's 400 introduced a new feature this year in the program of the annual charity ball. The "attraction" of the evening was a wheel of fortune from "Dutch Jake's" gambling hall kindly loaned to the ladies and operated by Spokane's boss gambler in all his glory. "Dutch Jake's" place is one of the largest and most profitable gambling houses operated in the northwest. It has three bars, a variety theatre, a dance hall and two rooms in which thirty gambling tables are run. The profits of the place are said to be in the neighborhood of one thousand dollars a night.

Unhappy Result of the Joke

The charity ball is an annual function given each year by the leading society matrons of the city for the benefit of a certain charitable institution. The list of patrons includes most of the society people of Spokane. The suggestion that the wheel of fortune be secured was made first by some young bloods of the city as a joke. Somehow it was regarded seriously and promptly taken up by the ladies. A committee called upon Jake and asked him for the use of the paraphernalia necessary to conduct the game. Jake was dazed with such a request coming from such quarters. Then the glory of it all dawned upon him and only lightning could beat his speed in trying to comply with everything they asked. He offered his services to personally run the games. The attraction was widely advertised. On the eventful evening it proved to be the greatest hit ever conceived by any charity show. Several society leaders of both sexes took their turn at "bucking the tiger" for the benefit of the noble cause and the profits of the wheel for the evening ran over seven hundred dollars. As soon as the ball was over there arose a wail of criticism against the good ladies who gave their sanction to the game of chance. Now the town is the scene of a bitter social controversy, while Jake and the "tiger" simply wink at each other.

CALIFORNIA MARKET SAN FRANCISCO

Hot Shot at the Presidio

The recent entertainment for the benefit of sick soldiers at the Presidio has started an interchange of "hot shot," which rivals anything now going on between Boer and British batteries in the Transvaal. The cause of the trouble is laid at the door of the civilians who have sprouted shoulder straps and are trying to invade society on the score of being "in the army." Of late the Presidio has been utilized as a depot for troops returning from the Philippines. Among them is a batch of officers who received commissions in the late war by the grace of their "pull" rather than their knowledge of drill, tactics and skill in strategy. It goes without saying that they are not all Captain Bradlee Strongs. Of course there are many among the "new" officers who are thoroughbreds and gentlemen who are gladly welcomed. But the buccaneers, the bold buccaneers who are trying so hard to invade society, the fellows who think that because they sailed to the Philippines and back in a government transport and made the passage safely they are entitled to the entree to the homes of the smart set—it is against them the dead line is to be drawn. Directing a mule train in the islands is not the stepping-stone to leading a cotillon here, though certain shoulder-straps seem to think so. And this smouldering feeling and this dancing near the dead line finally brought about the expected explosion.

Why the Plan of Campaign Failed

It came at the recent entertainment got up to amuse the invalided soldiers. One idea was conceived of getting society girls to give a vaudeville show at the Presidio for the benefit of the hospital patients. Numbers of the "new" officers saw their opportunity, and entered into the plan with gusto the moment they saw the names of the smart girls invited to take part. When the girls learned the object of the scheme they promoted it with heart and soul and got up a strikingly good program of society amateurs, headed by the Florodora sextet. On the appointed evening the girls and their friends showed up promptly to entertain the hapless invalids; but on looking over the audience, lo and behold! instead of the faces of the weak, wan and wounded soldiers, they saw before them a glittering array of gay evening toilettes and white shirt bosoms. Far in the background was a thin fringe of crippled soldiers who had been allowed to stand against the wall. There was nothing for the amateurs to do but to go on with the show. But after the curtain—well, to put it mildly, there were very plain words spoken by several vehement girls. "Outrageous" was one of the mildest expressions. They declared that if some of the medical fraternity had directed their energies to alleviating the sufferings of the invalids instead of getting up an entertainment for themselves, they would have worked on a truer charity plan.

Glued Gowns the Latest

This way, ladies, if you would learn how La Belle Otero accomplishes the "melted and poured into your clothes" effect which is the mode, some claim the vulgar mode, of the hour. "I just glue my gown to me with glycerine," she explains. "Suffer? Some. To be beautiful one must suffer." Here is something really new, and I wonder whether any of our willowy belles will emulate the Otero's Spartanesque fashion of glueing on her clothes. The famous danseuse gives the recipe of the mixture, which consists of glycerine and rose-water in a sticky consistency that will plaster the body and remain wet for hours. "I feel slippery inside," confesses La Belle Otero. "I feel indeed as an eel may feel, but I don't mind the discomfort."

Fleshings for a Foundation

For the benefit of those who may wish to give her method a trial it must be stated that only fleshings and a suede corset are worn over the paste and then the heavy, unlined cloth is stretched to the figure. Otero says that only the perfect dressmaker and the perfect figure can attempt "glued gowns." There are several figures in the smart set that lend themselves to the clinging fashions, but no doubt Mrs. Joe Tobin, Mrs. Gus Taylor, or Alice Hager and the others are content to put on the clothes without the glycerine plaster.

Jeghers-Bromley

The marriage of Miss Mary Jeghers and Mr. George A. Bromley was very quietly solemnized at St. Stephen's on Wednesday afternoon, the rector of the church, Reverend Edgar Lion, performing the ceremony. Afterwards there was an informal reception at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. John Mel in Lyon street, at which only relatives of the bride and bridegroom were present. The latter, who is the elder son of George T. Bromley, was married before, his present wife having been the maid of honor at his former marriage. His first wife was Kate Wakelee, the only daughter of H. P. Wakelee, the pioneer pharmacist and founder of the firm of Wakelee & Co. Somewhat of a coincidence was the fact that the late Washington Bartlett, one time Mayor of San Francisco, gave the bride away on the occasion of Mr. Bromley's first marriage, and his brother, Columbus Bartlett, performed this office for Wednesday's bride.

Papa Murphy Forbids the Match

If the latest news from Washington is true Addie Murphy is not to marry young Siebert. Murphy pere rushed on there to answer to a summons and after a careful examination of the situation has taken the stand he made in the McNutt suit. My surmises of last week were evidently right. The fortune of the fiance likely failed to come up to the expectation of the fiancee's pater. Papa Murphy loves money; he has never made any concealment of that fact. He didn't like John Biddle, the husband of his daughter Ethel, in spite of his blue blood, because the poor boy did not have dollars to back his pedigree. Possibly he thought one blooded son-in-law enough in the family; then again he may have heard something dampening about the state of the wool market. We shall have to wait for the true story until Miss Murphy herself is heard from. So another Murphy match and a Murphy catch has gone glimmering and Addie—what will Addie say?

La Fille du Regiment

Mrs. Robert Nuttall has a new sobriquet which fits her snugly. For years Mrs. Nuttall has worn hats of one pattern—pert little turbans a la Tommy Atkins—with a brush quill bobbing briskly on one side. For styles may come and styles may go, but hers goes on forever. The effect is very military and a wag recently dubbed her the "Daughter of the Regiment," which title will probably cling to her as long as she is faithful to the jaunty turban. Mrs. Nuttall's headgear is not more remarkable than the gray matter tucked under it. She is unquestionably the brightest and most versatile woman in the smart set and the ease with which she sparkles in small talk or puts to rout the heavyweights in the art of conversation has long been the wonder and delight of her friends. Whenever a celebrity dines with the ton, Mrs. Nuttall is placed to his right and the lion's roar has the edge taken off by Mrs. Nuttall's epigrams and intelligent grasp of any subject from Cicero to Cheiro. The distinguished guest is invariably impressed and leaves San Francisco with the idea that the town is another Athens. Mrs. Nuttall, as Hilda Rosenstock, was the pride of local Jewish society, but since her marriage she moves almost exclusively in the Nuttall circle. The Nuttalls are not only related by marriage to talent, but have bred in the bone cleverness. Mrs. Zelia Nuttall—who waived the right to her married name with alimony—is also a very gifted woman. She was given the order of the Italian Immortel, a rare distinction for a woman and an American at that. The family genius is not entirely feminine gender, for the Nuttall brothers are also distinguished for their cleverness in their respective lines.

There is nothing in the world more delightful than a drink of good whiskey—and Jesse Moore is good whiskey.

First Corner Politician: What's the organization doing while all this shindy's being cut up in the City Hall?

Second Politician: Oh, Phil, ain't sayin' nothin'; he's out in his woodpile fixin' up his saw.

Last of Jennie June's Fortune

My New York correspondent writes me that although Jennie June (Mrs. Jennie Croly) did not die in absolute want, she was rapidly reaching very reduced circumstances. Then years ago she was worth something like one hundred thousand dollars, but through the poor business advice offered by solicitous friends this was rapidly reduced till a scant few thousand dollars remained: rather a pathetic ending for the woman who pioneered the way for women in the newspaper and periodical world. In her day she was by far the best known and most popular woman writer for the press, and any paper that did not have its "Jennie June" column was not considered worth handing around the sitting room. The fortune of one hundred thousand dollars which she accumulated is the best commentary on her immense success, for in her day there were far fewer papers and a writer's emoluments were extremely meagre.

The Procession of Stunning Gowns

After the Landers-Tallant luncheon Tuesday the girls separated and part of them went to Mrs. Chase's tea and the rest to Marie Wells'. I never saw more beautiful frocks than were worn at Mrs. Tallant's. Katherine Herrin is the most patrician looking of girls and she was a dream in pink muslin. Bernice Landers wore a handsome white embroidered crepe de chine, and Katherine Robinson was very chic in turquoise blue silk.

Latest Gossip from London

My London correspondent writes:

Sybil Sanderson is back here with her next husband, Comte Henri Fitz James. She goes to Paris in a few days to get ready for her new opera. When I asked her the date of the marriage, she laughed and said she didn't know. Comte Henri told me later, though, that it would be in February. He laid great stress on the fact that he was "not going to marry a Gaiety Girl off the stage but Madame Sanderson, a great artist, known the world over. Ah, she holds a high, a very high rank," he added. "Will she leave the stage after marriage?" I asked. "No," he replied, "I think she has no such intention. Her life as an artist, a very great artist, belongs to the world. If she had married a painter she certainly would not insist on his giving up his art. I should be just as unfair if I insisted on my future wife giving up the profession of her heart. As for myself, I hope to derive a handsome income on certain concessions others and myself have just obtained in French Guiana. The land is said to contain gold and india rubber trees in great quantities. Plans are under way to build a railroad and I feel quite confident we shall soon develop another Transvaal. My intentions now are to sail for South America some time in April, that is about a month after my marriage. No, my wife will not accompany me but will continue here to the end of her opera season. Then she may join me." I observed that Madame Sanderson didn't think it necessary to make any comment on this last statement.

A New American Beauty

One of the most striking beauties of the coming season will be Miss Gladys Deacon, the American girl, who has been taken up so much lately by the Duchess of Marlborough. (Vanderbilt). Whistler is going to paint her portrait. Her sister, only seventeen years old, is also a little beauty, and the two of them are expected to repeat the furore created by the famous Gunning sisters, a hundred years ago. No end of surprise has just been created by the fact which has just leaked out that a number of members of the highest nobility have not sent in their applications for seats in Westminster Abbey during the coronation on account of the heavy cost of the necessary robes. There will be no danger of any of the avaricious peers disposing of any of these coveted seats to the nouveau riche because those in charge, under the strictest instructions, have kept vigilant tab on every ticket issued. Should any but the proper holders present them there is sure to be something more than a social rumpus.. It looks as if lilies will share with roses the honor of being the popular flower at the coronation. Growers are making great preparations to meet such a demand, with the result that bulbs are being imported from Germany and Holland in great quantities. Another complication has arisen out of the interminable question of precedence. According to program the Duchess of Fife will be the third lady in rank coming after the Queen and the Princess of Wales, and before her two sisters. Her husband, the Duke, however, is billed to trail behind all the other dukes. The Duchess is unwilling to march in her place without her husband by her side and now the much badgered King is considering whether, by royal will, he can place Fife there without raising a storm of indignation from the ducal bench.

Troubles of an Erratic Lord

One wing of Society is very much interested now in the suit for divorce of Lord Rosslyn against his wife. Since he failed with his "system" to break the bank at Monte Carlo his notoriety has greatly increased. Managers looking for sensations are hot after him as a drawing card in their theatrical ventures. Those who advanced him the money for his assault on the Monte Carlo game have meekly pocketed their losses as the agreements entered into gives them no ground for recovery. Lord Rosslyn's wife was Violet Aline, the daughter of Robert de Gray Vyner of Grantley Hall. He is very wealthy and has taken every precaution that his erratic son-in-law shall not get any of it. Rosslyn charges his wife with desertion. She has filed no answer, being only too glad that he shall succeed in his suit.

Prince Edward's Pert Proposition

A funny incident happened the other day in the class room where little Prince Edward is being tutored. The future King of England has a profound distaste for arithmetic and is frequently sent to the corner with his face to the wall as punishment for evidencing his dislike. Very recently when he saw the books and slates got out for the day's lesson, he gravely walked to the punishment corner, cooly turned round and said, "I don't think I'll do 'rithmetic today. I'll stand in the corner instead if you don't mind." What could the poor tutor do?

The Friedlander Girls as Chefs

The Friedlander girls have proved that society women can do something beside art fallals when left to steer their own skiffs. When they first attempted to cater for the smart set they found all was not smooth sailing. People could not adjust themselves to the idea that the girls were really capable of cooking dainties to please fastidious palates. While their venture was yet young there were few who would trust them for big 'feeds," but this season they have done the cooking for some of the largest and swellest affairs. Fancy the Friedlanders wrestling with sauce mousseline or concocting punch marasquin, but fate seems to have thrown them a cook book as a sop for their fallen fortunes, and they are making the most of their culinary talents. I hear they have been given the order for the Huntington ball which is a juicy plum for their pudding. It takes brains and pluck for girls who never even boiled water to attempt and attain high-class catering and they deserve all success.

California Miniaturists

Laura Prather's recent exhibition of miniatures at a local gallery has shown what an American girl can do when she sets herself to a task. Miss Prather is one clever Californian miniaturist. Miss Wores, a sister of Theodore Wores, is another who does exquisite work. The latter has studied only in San Francisco. Then there is Rose Hooper. When Miss Hooper, two years ago, went abroad, half of her circle of friends thought that she was going to Europe to "do" the continent in the usual way. None of them thought of her as a girl with a career. She was so essentially a society girl; not a bit of a "new woman." One does not think of a society girl in the role of a successful actress, artist or writer. Of course there are exceptions, such as Mrs. Burton Harrison, Mrs. Van Rennsslaer Cruger, Miss Elsie de Wolfe, Miss Frances Joliffe and a few others, but as a rule the world of art and literature is not recruited from society's ranks. Laura Prather and Rose Hooper were both "butterflies" before they took up art as a career.

A Visiting Eastern Artist

Lillie V. O'Ryan, the painter of the original Janice Meredith miniature, is at present visiting San Francisco. She has painted Marie Oge and some other society beauties and the originals express themselves as delighted with the likeness. She is being lionized in a small way by those people who have made her acquaintance, but she does not court publicity.

Funny Accident at Target Practice

In recounting stories of funny accidents at target practice Henry Halford topped the others with this: "It was not a very clear day and as I was about to fire at the one thousand yard mark I thought it prudent to warn the marker, so I telephoned out to him, 'Are you all right?' He answered, 'All right, sir, in a minute.' It so happened that all I caught of his answer was 'All right, sir"; at any rate when I heard the 'sir' I hung up the 'phone. I fired and was calmly looking through my glass to see where I had hit, when to my horror I saw the marker rise from the ground with a livid face and stagger towards his shelter. I ran out to him believing that somehow I had committed some terrible accident. 'Are you badly hurt?' I asked. 'No, sir,' he said. 'What's the matter, then?' 'Why, you see, sir, after answering your telephone I went back to finish white-washing the target. I had just settled down with the bucket between my legs when you fired. The bullet struck it and splashed the white-wash all over me."

How Depew made His Argumeni

Chauncey Depew is being badgered and joshed at a great rate since his arrival home with his young bride. Perhaps the bright old blade may be getting a trifle rattled—certainly a rare condition for the heretofore elefor his repeating himself, for that is what the great for him repeating himself, for that is what the great "Joe" Miller of his time was caught at the other evening. The story is a good one, of course, else Chauncey wouldn't have repeated it. On the first occasion it was launched at a big Chamber of Commerce banquet. It was late in the evening when Depew was called upon. He was literally crammed with political arguments, which he was eager to fling at Cleveland, Breckenridge and other robust speakers who had preceded him. He wanted to show that the Democrats would damn the nation if they didn't explain their policy; that this nation could survive the millennium because it would be all ready for its coming. With his after-dinner perspicuity Depew quickly saw that his audience was tired, and in no humor to receive heavy arguments. So, instead, he gave them this little story to serve his point: "Up in Peekskill one time there was a Millerite excitement. Miller had predicted on a certain night, at exectly twelve o'clock, the world would end. A very pious man, a shoemaker, believed in the prophecy, left his business early in the day, and prepared with his family for the solemn event. Midnight passed, and one o'clock was approaching. The shoemaker felt that it was time to appeal to a higher power than Mr. Miller, so he got down on his knees and prayed, 'O Lord, if the millennium is to come let it come now, and then I shall be translated at once to a land where the people wear no shoes and shoemakers are happy in doing nothing; but if it is to be postponed let me know now, because I must get ready Mrs. Brown's shoes for Sunday morning church or lose the best customer I have!'"

Old Time Reporters

There has been a good deal of reminiscent chat raised as a sequel to the Bulletin's recent editorial on the old-time newspaper men. A correspondent who signs himself "One of the Old Time Reporters," writes me as follows:

I remember in my day that one of the most popular reporters was Ned Knight, of the Alta. He was Harry Livingstone's contemporary and shared with him the prestige of knowing more people than any other San Francisco reporter Livingstone, before he came to this city, was one of the shining lights on the Sacramento Union in that journal's palmy days. Then there was stout, jolly Steve King, of the Sun. When that journal passed away, King went to Nevada, becoming Wells, Fargo & Co.'s agent at Gold Run. Bob Quale worked on the Sun when John C. Cremony was its editor. He was a brilliant writer but his mode of life was not conducive to health. He finally went back to his Philadelphia home where he died of consumption. John Urmy, another old-time reporter, raised a company during the Civil War and did good service. Mr. Kemble, the Alta's original proprietor, was a popular man in the fraternity. He was not a working reporter but was nevertheless a live newspaper man. After serving for a while as Paymaster in the Army, he became the New York correspondent of the California Associated Press, at his death being succeeded in that position by his son, J. C. Kemble. George Barnes, up to the time of his death dramatic critic of the Call, George K. Fitch of the Bulletin, Loring Pickering, Fred Marriott, Sr., Fred McCrellish, Roach, Soule, and John Washington, were all names familiar in the early newspaper annals of San Francisco.

Sing, hey, diddle diddle,

And his tune played to catch the civilian:
The job-chasers dance,
And the "pollies" all prance,
While the League leads off the cotillion.

Battling for Political Jobs

The Broad-Browed Brigade is trying to figure out the list of casualities likely to occur at the City Hall in the hot and heavy battle for possession of the public crib. Nobody outside the lawyers and those posing as "public servants" of the people have the effrontery to claim that it is anything else. The Mayor has learned a thing or two since he was repulsed in the attack on the County Clerk's office, and he isn't publishing bulletins of his intentions; but it's very well known that he intends to move up and down the City Hall corridors with his insistent cohorts and "clean out" every political office that the law allows him. This policy is a natural development of the action inaugurated by Phelan when he tried to oust a Board of Supervisors, and later fired Biggy from the Police Commissioners. The new combination with Ruef, et als.—especially the et. als.—have taken these tips. They're not shouting "To the victor belong the spoils," but they've got the best lot of hanky-panky affidavits ever turned out to satisfy the demands of a truly moral Charter, and they'll make the Charter look like a municipal sieve before they finish the campaign. How the charter-phobia "pollies" are grinning!

Stacks of "Moral" Evidence

That the new combination means business is evidenced by the remark that Mayor Schmitz let drop to Ed Williams during a breathing spell in the fight for the Justice Court clerkship. "It may look hard, but we couldn't take any chances," said the Mayor; "we had to begin somewhere, and you were the nearest." "Yes," chipped in Ruef, stretching forward a hand six feet above the floor, "we've got a stack of 'dope' affidavits that high ready to serve." The combination figured out that this "moral" charge was the easiest and cheapest way to suspend a man from office, capture his job, and make the grand-stand play of acting strictly within the provisions of the charter. With this "suspension" club the combination intends to beat its way into all the offices it can and take a chance that the law will sustain such action. If it wins there is an office for the Primary League and the others to divide; if it loses there's nothing lost—for the taxpayers foot the bills as usual.

Strategical Point in the Fight

But the failure in these two cases hasn't daunted the assailants. There are too many fat jobs along the line and some of the offices seem bound to fall. They expect gratifying results when their battering ram goes against the door of a charter office. The vital position in the contest is the Civil Service Commission. The plans to capture that strategic point have been carefully and systematically formulated. Commissioner McCarthy's name will be changed from Pin Head to Mud. Chief Examiner Moran has got to go and so has his stenographer. Intrenched in this position the winners can reach their hands into every charter office in the building and nothing will be left the "Organization Republicans" and "Disorganization Democrats" occupying those places but to decide on the form of their resignations or the style of their funerals. Meanwhile the "organization" and its affiliating wings are stoutly entrenching themselves in the county offices, where the Charter cannot trouble and the "easy" are at rest.

Society Preparing to Entertain

With Miss Helen Gould on her way here and Mrs. Tessie Oelrichs and Mrs. Birdie Vanderbilt shortly to arrive our 400 will find themselves up to the neck in frivolity. They will surely need the forty days of penitence and prayer of Lent to sleep off the effects of all this prospective gaiety. The Crockers will probably do their best to make Miss Gould like San Francisco and its environs. Jennie Blair will see that her old chum, Tessie, doesn't find the city slow after the New York and Newport pace and Mrs. Vanderbilt will likely be seized upon by her old convent mates. Of course there will be some quiet teas and friendly luncheons at the house on the hill.

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

A Military Organization

In the whirl and whirr of the closing season, one of the most brilliant events that will be recorded in the ante-Lenten social annals of 1902 will be the military ball of the Alumni Commissioned Officers' Association of the University of California in Golden Gate hall. Preparations for the ball, invitations for which were sent out well in advance of its date, January twenty-fourth, were greatly in demand. Nearly every prominent Army, Navy and National Guard officer who received cards sent an immediate acceptance. There is something very fascinating about a military ball, with its gold lace, gold buttons, swords and sashes. The patronesses of the ball, Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst, Mrs. A. O. Leuchner, Mrs. I. Stringham, Mrs. Walter Magee and Mrs. F. A. Denicke, are all representatives of our best society, and the committee in charge of the ball includes the names of Colonel George W. Bauer, Lieutenant Colonel Charles H. Murphy, Major Percival Dolman, Major W. A. Brewer, Captains William Jurgens, F. A. Denicke and J. W. Miller and Lieutenants J. D. Hatch, J. A. McGee, J. Gallagher and C. Schilling. The Alumni Association consists of the commissioned officers of the regiment of cadets of the University of California, who have graduated and have been retired into the National Guard of California, ranking from second lieutenant to colonel. The association was organized with eighty members in September, 1900, and the membership is now one hundred and seventy-five. Colonel Bauer, the commander at this time, is commander of the naval militia of this State and is also a member of other fraternal organizations, in each of which he is an officer.

(In Matrimony.)

[Letters from Miss Florence Dorsey, a San Francisco belle traveling abroad, to her intimate friend at home.]

London, October 6, 1901.

Dear Edith: I am too homesick to breathe. I cannot bear London, and wish I were back in our old Pacific avenue house and entertaining a bunch of you at dinner. It's so stiff here. The girls are cordial after their fashion, but it is not our way, and I do long to enjoy one of our jolly little dances at the Fortnightly where I know everybody and everybody knows me. But sister won't go back till after the coronation. She wants to be here for the whole business. We have taken a house and though the smart people are out of town now, there is quite a bit of shopping to be done, so our time is taken up. Tell dear old Bob that I shall never forget him. I can't bear the London men. They are simply hateful. Sister must give in to our engagement sometime—tell Bob so. Lovingly, Flo.

October 19, 1901.

Dearest Edith: Well, we're right in the swim. Lady Listeth—you know Sis was one of her bridesmaids at home—invited us for the shooting, and we have been here over a week, our stay being limited to two. I begin to like Englishmen. Beneath the "Johnnie Bull" exterior, I find their hearts are warm. I don't think our men—of course, my brothers, and yours, and Bob should be excepted—are as courteous as these Britishers on their own soil. We thought Sir Peter an awful boor when he married Kate, but I think Lady Listeth has got a gem, since seeing Peter on his native heath. The men here take more time to compliment you. Our men spend lots of money on us, but they won't give us their time. I wish we had a leisure class at home. What a pity Bob has to work in his father's insurance office. I noticed the same thing in Chicago and New York—a man takes it for granted you're willing to be friendly, his "pal," as they say here, and he doesn't spend any time trying to gain the liking he's sure is already his. But I'll write you more later. Must dress for dinner now and there's a ball later on. By the way, did I tell you I met a charming fellow in London, just before we came here. He is a cousin of Sir Peter's—name, Tom Listeth. His father married a tradesman's daughter, so he has lots of money. By-by. Love to Bob—don't forget. Sincerely, Flo.

Castleraggal, November 10, 1901.

Dear Ede: We're in Scotland, guests of Tom Listeth. He owns this place and several others. It's a magnificent old castle. I like England more and more. In my last letter I told you that our men can't come up to our British cousins in manners. Well, it's so. When I met Mr. Listeth in London he bowed low over my hand, adjusted his monocle (and he doesn't look silly, as—well, Bob does, when he tries a single glass) very deliberately, and said: "Charmed!" Then followed a froth of light small talk. Oh, my, Edith, why can't our fellows, who are so brainy and clever, manage small talk as Tom Listeth does? He is perfect at it; so is Sir Peter; so are all the men I've met here. You hear small talk everywhere, whether at the theatre, at four o'clock tea, at "at homes," between courses at the Trocadero, and between acts at the theatre. And all the time the man is talking he's sizing you up, as he does the horse he is thinking of buying. I thought it awfully embarrassing at first, but I'm getting used to it now. Perhaps, after this inspection, he may ask you to luncheon—Tom did. Of course, not alone, here, that would be horribly improper (and think of us dining alone with fellows at home, upstairs, too!), but Mr. Listeth asked Sister. She couldn't go, so I did not. But after that invitation, you can be sure whoever the Englishman is, you have safely passed the ordeal. He considers you "quite fit" to become his friend. When I first came up to this sort of thing, I said to myself, "Do these fellows never work at all?" For one meets them in the morning in the Park, in Regent street in the early afternoon, in the Galleries at tea hour, and in the theatre box at night. When the out-of-town visiting is on, they visit also. No matter where you see them, they are always smiling at you and sizing you up. Well, good-bye now. How are all the folks? Must be horribly dull at home now, with only those little dances and the same round of teas—and the same men. Write soon.

Yours, Flo.

P. S.—Remember me kindly to Bob.

London, December 17, 1901.

Dear Edith: Perhaps you won't be greatly surprised when I tell you I am going to be married—to Tom Listeth. I'll tell you just how it was. These English fellows are so dogmatic. "Because I wish" is their pass-key, as it were. At home you know, though the men do not compliment us much, they generally do just as we please. But these Englishmen! Well, perhaps one of them asks you to do something not quite pleasant. You argue the point. He insists—even if it's only wearing your hair parted instead of pompadour! He says it in that slow, cold way of his, and you—silly thing that you are!—do it just because he insists. Fancy me in a fringe! Yet, Edith, that is what my hair has come to, a real English fringe. I refused at first to wear it so; I vowed to myself I would not, but it didn't matter. I wear the fringe because Tom wishes it. And I promised to marry him because he simply insisted on my saying yes. I don't know whether I love him; perhaps I do. I will probably, just as I cut my hair off at his bidding. Oh, Edith, dear, you will tell Bob, won't you? Indeed, I could never have married him. Sister would never have consented, you know. Why wasn't Bob gifted with a British will?

Your devoted Flo.

P. S.—We are shopping now—the trousseau. I wish you could come over for the wedding. It is to be just before Lent.—The Chaperon.

STAGE

A Pleasingly Reminiscent Opera

It is nice to be reminded of things. The old is better than the new. Every time I read a new novel I thank the gods for the old ones. That may be one reason why I, with a majority of the audience at the Columbia on Monday night, enjoyed "The Princess Chic." The plot is a good one and is well worked out. The book, by Kirk La Shelle, who is the namesake and proprietor of the opera, is not astonishingly clever but it is sufficiently so to be amusing. The presence of four comedians, with wits and legs of lightning-like quickness, lends sparkle to the dialogue. "The Fortune Teller" comes to mind in the heroine's several changes of character and costume. It is the music, by Julian Edwards, that delights by the flood of happy reminiscences it invokes. Every favorite bit of the old operas is suggested, whether intentionally or not does not matter. The effect is the same and it is pleasant. The choruses are excellent and are really the best parts of the score. They are well sung, too, with plenty of spirit. The chorus girls are not ravishing beauties, nor are their legs such as to make a sculptor long for them as models, but they can sing; so can the men, whose faces and lower limbs are not necessary to the story.

The Prima Donna

A lively and interesting cast interprets "The Princess Chic." It reminds one of the Bostonians' operas in that there is an even excellence that bids defiance to stars. All do well, but none does any better than the other. On Monday night, the heft of applause after Tom Leary got his warm welcome was for Maude Lillian Berri. That was as it should be, when a native daughter returns to her old home. I am glad to see that Miss Berri's head has retained its normal measurement after her succession of Eastern successes, reports of which were wafted this way. She was as natural in demeanor as if she had been singing before an audience of friends every night of her life. She is a typical comic opera prima donna. The role of the venturesome princess is sung and acted with elan. While comparisons are ever odious, I cannot refrain from saying that both D'Arville and Jessie Bartlett Davis are brought to mind by Maude Berri's Princess Chic. She is so blithe, so nimble with her sword and on her feet. She acts with so much verve. Her voice is not sweet and it lacks sympathy but it has a ringing quality on the high notes that is effective. She has a friendly way with her that is eminently attractive and goes a long way toward winning an audience.

The Others

Hubert Wilke makes of Charles the Bold a life-like and picturesque figure and sings his sword solo in the first act with plenty of spirit. A bass voice of unusual power is that of Edward Metcalfe who, with W. A. Lawrence, appears as one of the swaggering soldiers of fortune. He was twice recalled for his number in the third act. It is in this act, by the way, that many of the best things are crowded. Tom Leary and Neil McNeil have some laughable farcical scenes. They also assist in the topical quartet with Metcalfe and Lawrence, the tramp soldiers. McNeil, who has the role of the Princess Chic's steward, is original and amusing. Edna Floyd is a pretty and graceful girl with a face that is a replica of Nordica's. Knights, MacArthur, Hoyle, Bartlett and Miss Hunting fill their roles to everybody's satisfaction.

A Society Girl's Recital

The entire Jewish swim was present to applaud Eleanor Haber on Thursday night of last week, when that popular young woman made her bid for recognition as a dramatic student and not a mere society girl. Miss Haber is going to be a success. I feel sure of it. In the first place, she is very modest and entirely minus the self-consciousness that is usually the bane of amateurs. And the flowers that were passed over the footlights to her in fragrant bunches and baskets were not sweeter than the pretty girl who bowed her thanks for her friends' lavishness. Miss Haber reminds me of Julia Arthur in appearance and I should judge that she will find her fitting place in the portrayal of emotional roles. Her porgram was a varied one, embracing many old favorites and some less hackneyed numbers. Field's "The Wind" was especially good. As yet she betrays the amateur in a lack of full command of her facial expression, but that is fault that time and experience will erase. She is, I am told, going to New York to continue her studies before making a professional debut. She is an earnest and diligent student and does not intend to tempt failure with any half-fledged work.

A New Don Caesar

To the many "Don Caesar de Bazan" is associated with the name of young Salvini. He was the ideal Don Caesar, and to most of us will always remain so. But Edwin Arden may become the ideal Don Caesar of the new generation of play-goers if he continues to appear in the role. Mr. Arden is young, handsome, full of life and imbued with enthusiasm. He gives a very pleasing picture of the dashing Don. The Grand Opera House company is lending excellent support to the star in this play. Miss Hall is a sweet and lovely Maritana and Miss Bankson's Marchioness very cleverly seconds Mr. Byers' Marquis. Mr. Waldron, who is one of the strongest actors in the company, is a forceful Charles II, and Mr. Mayall as the prime minister goes far beyond any of his previous work. Scenically the production is finer than Salvini's.

A Prize for a Drama

Percy Haswell, the pretty actress whom we first saw here in "Shenandoah" but who has since visited us in other plays, is now a star at the head of her own company. Through her manager, Mr. George Fawcett, she announces a competition. She will give an elaborate and careful production of a new play, by an American author, at her Baltimore theatre, will pay a cash royalty the equivalent of the largest sum paid for the use of the highest priced royalty play produced by her this season, and will furthermore purchase outright, the prize play, should it make the hit expected when produced. The author retains all his rights in the premises if his play is selected, and receives in addition a cash prize equal to the average royalty paid for the use of a play by Henry Arthur Jones, Clyde Fitch, or some other recognized and successful author. The only stipulation Miss Haswell makes, is that in return for giving a production to the work of a new author, she be granted first option to purchase the play for her own use in the future. Miss Haswell requires that the play shall be original, by an American author, and that it shall be received in Baltimore before February fifteenth. All other things being equal, a play for a woman star will be preferred. The decision will be made by a committee of three Baltimore dramatic critics, in conjunction with Miss Haswell's business manager, Mr. Will A. Page. All plays intended for this competition should be addressed to Mr. Will A. Page, Chase's Lyceum Theatre, Baltimore, Md. All plays must be accompanied by sufficient postage for their return if rejected, and all plays must be submitted at the risk of the senders. The decision will be announced as soon as possible after February fifteenth, and the successful play will be given an immediate production.

Attractions Next Week

Josephine Sabel will be at the Orpheum next week and she is sure to get a rattling welcome from parquet and gallery alike. Sabel is the most dashing and magnetic singer on the circuit, and she is endeared to San Franciscans by many memories. It was she who first gave us "Hot Time" and "Don't Want to Talk Any More." Sabel's costumes are always unique and handsome, and she is sure to have a trunk full of new ones to delight the women. Burt Jordan and Rosa Crouch are novelty dancers who are new here. The great "Cycle Whirl" will be introduced. On a circular track, five feet high and built at an angle of seventy degrees, two expert wheelmen will ride, and while in full motion will perform many difficult and sensational tricks. The track is funnel shaped and the slant is so great that when the men are at their greatest speed they appear to be riding parallel with the floor. Kelly and Violette, the "fashion plate duo," will introduce the latest songs. The Nambas, a Japanese man and boy, will introduce acrobatic, equilibristic and juggling feats. The Taylor sisters, Ada Arnoldson, the Da Coma family and the biograph will fill out the bill.

Edwin Arden will appear in the dual role of actor and author at the Grand Opera House during the next week. Mr. Arden's play "Zorah" is a romantic drama which tells the story of persecution of the tribes of Israel in Russia. The play is full of incident, forcibly written and founded mainly on facts. Its action takes place in Russia and in one of the penal colonies of Siberia. The third act is down in the Siberian mines where the convicts are often chained to their wheelbarrows and even forced to sleep on them at night. The cast will be exceptionally strong and in addition to Mr. Arden and the regular members of the stock company, will include Gardner Crane and his talented wife, Margaret Terry, who have recently made such a hit at the Orpheum. The stage settings of "Zorah" are elaborate and picturesque.

Owing to the preparations now going on for a big production of "The Danites," the Alcazar management has decided to postpone its presentation for another week, and allow "Coralie & Co., Dressmakers," a French farce, to be the attraction for next week. One of the authors of "Coralie & Co." is the noted writer of the original of all French farces, "Pink Dominoes." "Coralie & Co." was originally produced at the Palais Royal, being later presented in New York. There is a lightning stage change in the first act that is a clever bit of mechanics. On the rise of the curtain the occupants are having a gay time, when the alarm is sent of the gendarmes' raid. Quick as a flash, everybody disappears, and the walls revolve at the touch of a button, and before the audience realizes it the stage has every appearance of a dressmaking apartment, with operators at sewing machines, and a young woman, partly negligee, having a dress tried on. The gendarmes apologize, and all is serene again. How they are finally discovered by accidental pressure of the button is said to be the funniest situation ever devised.

Monday evening the Tivoli will put on "The Ameer," the comic opera in which Frank Daniels formerly starred here. "The Ameer's" plot is bright, its libretto clever and

A SCENIC LINE.

One of the most picturesque calendars that have been issued this year is that of the Missouri Pacific Railway. Railroad art and literature have attained a high standard and this calendar ranks among the best. Each month has its special picture, a beautiful reproduction of a water color sketch, showing a scene on the Missouri Pacific route. There is one with a glimpse of river and mountain, others showing a group of darkies picking cotton, a lone fisherman, a cattle scene, etc. The Missouri Pacific Limited, of which L. M. Fletcher, 126 California street, is the Pacific Coast agent, passes through scenes like these and well deserves its name of being the finest service to the East over a scenic route. The road extends from San Francisco to St. Louis. A feature is personally conducted excursions to Chicago, New York, Boston and all Eastern points.

THE CARNIVAL OF FAIRYLAND

The Pacific Cat Club will have a booth at the Carnival of Fairyland which will be opened at the Mechanics' Pavilion on February eighth. Professor Bothwell Brown is drilling the children who will take part in the carnival, and a wonderful allegorical ballet is part of the program. There will be an orchestra of twenty pieces to furnish the music. On the opening night a new musical drama, "He is a Native Son" will have its initial presentation. The Carnival promises to be a most unique and pleasing affair.

A CHANGE AND A MOVE.

H. T. McKnight, who made so many friends here when he was demonstrating for the "Locomobile" company is now in an office of his own. With W. C. Anderson he is representing the Pacific Automobile Company, at 201-203 Larkin street, opposite the City Hall. This company is general agent for the Olds Mobile, one of the best liked horseless carriages in the market.

No brand of whisky is more popular than Argonaut "O. K." It is recommended by physicians and epicures. E. Martin & Co., 54-56 First street, are proprietors of Argonaut "O. K." whiskies, rye and bourbon.

The January number of Country Life is devoted to California and its resources. This periodical is published by Doubleday and Page, and its editor, L. H. Bailey, recently visited this State. His impressions are recorded in a vivid editorial entitled "California." Joaquin Miller contributes a poem entitled "The Heroes of the Firing Line." A. J. Wells has a good paper upon the country life of California, Charles Howard Shinn is interestingly reminiscent of the late General Bidwell's estate at Rancho Chico, and E. J. Wickson discourses upon Semi-tropical Gardening. The illustrations are beyond praise. One has never seen finer in any periodical. Where all are so excellent it is almost impossible to particularize, but special mention must be made of those of C. H. Tibbetts, reproduced by courtesy of the Southern Pacific Company. His redwoods, Monterey cypresses, palms, and cattle at Santa Ysabel are works of art. O. V. Lange and O. H. Bailey also contribute excellent photographic work.

Two famous portraits, Benjamin Ide Wheeler by Orrin Peck, and Miss Marion Holden by Janvier T. Martinez, are reproduced in the December number of the Mark Hopkins' Institute Review of Art, and will be examined with unusual interest. A copper plate etching of an old house in Mission street by Will Sparks is a telling bit of work. The notes of local artists and art matters make good reading.

MUSIC

Hofmann's Programs

There will be the usual throng of music-minds at the Columbia next Tuesday and Friday afternoons, when Josef Hofmann plays through the following programs: Tuesday—Fugue, A minor, Bach-Liszt; sonate, A flat major, op. 39, Weber; Scherzo, a cappriccio, Mendelssohn; "Berceuse," "Durch die Wolken," Josef Hofmann; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; ballade, G minor, two Polish songs, G flat major and G major, Chopin; "Liebestraum," "Valse Mephisto," Liszt. Friday—Variations, F minor, Haydn; sonate appassionata, F minor, Op. 57, Beethoven; impromptu, G major, "Soiree de Vienne," Schubert; ballade, A flat major, prelude No. 25, valse, A flat, Chopin; "Gnomenreigen," Liszt; "Nachstucke," Schumann; "Jongleu," Moszkowski; overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner. The advance sale of seats has been enormous.

Something about the Pianist

Josef has dimples and "unmusical hair," according to a New York writer. He is not a poseur, and he plays without affectation. He is a clever youth, and has written some good articles for the magazines. He has also rather a gift of humor. He is passionately addicted to automobiling, and also likes to go to the races.

Conservatory Recital

The recital given by the San Francisco Conservatory of Music on Wednesday the fifteenth instant was without exception and from every point of view the best public work ever done by that institution. Not alone was the program itself selected from a higher grade of music, but the work of the pupils showed an almost marvelous improvement over previous efforts. The little ones particularly excited much admiration for the preciseness of rhythm and perfect phrasing in execution and strength of finger touch. The piano and violin sonata No. 1 by Schubert, performed by little Rita Lubelski and Gladys Couth was an excellent piece of work, the little pianiste keeping perfect time to little Miss Couth's violin. The sonata in C major for two pianos, by Mozart, performed by Bessie Gregg and Madeline Buckley, the latter of whom is a mere babe, was wonderfully fine. There was not a shade's difference in time, each cue was taken on the instant, and the execution throughout was even, clean and clear-cut, showing most excellent training. Of the older pupils Mr. W. H. Beatty played the Littolff "Spinnlied" with great facility, his runs being beautifully smooth and even. Miss Rahlman gave the "Revolutionary" etude of Chopin in fine tempo and good execution and Miss Chandler showed good work also in two numbers, "Le Papillon" (Lavalee), and the "Rondo" from the Weber sonata Op. 24. Maybelle Kelley is rapidly fulfilling the promise of her early work and exceeded herself in this evening's performance. She had two numbers, the Chopin "Fantasie Impromptu" which displayed her pianistic talent strongly and later the Mendelssohn Concerto Op. 25, which was accompanied by a full orchestra from the conservatory forces. This performance was really wonderful considering that the orchestral part was done entirely by amateurs, and it was done well and creditably throughout. Miss Kelley sustained the piano part with Mr. Rogers at a second piano and her work was splendidly done. Those who composed the orchestra were: Violins, Misses J. Sultu, A. Valentino, M. Easton, Marie Abeille, A. Ahkman, Mrs. W. Castro, Messrs. J. Ross, W. Hill, A. Thiel, A. Schwartz and J. Lahrman; violas, Messrs Hunt and Harrison; flute, Mr. van Marle; cello and basso, Miss A. Conlin, Messrs. Herrick, Hartwig and Krenzburger; cornet, Mr. T. F. Kelley. The San Francisco Mandolin club gave some very enjoyable numbers and a symphony by Mendelssohn for piano and string quartet was well rendered by Misses Burns and Beaudet at the piano; violins, Miss Annie Benson and Mr. Benson; viola, Mr. Hunt, and cello, Mr. McLean. Miss Marie Abeille played a violin solo very gracefully and well and the vocal pupils, Miss Gallick, Miss Towle and Miss Slocombe, did their part toward the evening's entertainment. The two children of the vocal instructor, Alfred Kelleher, covered themselves with glory and won loud plaudits from the immense audience for their really beautiful and artistic work. Agnes Kelleher cannot be more than twelve and little Joe looks not a day over ten, but they sang the "O Holy Mother" from "Maritana" perfectly and with voices so fresh and sweet it made listening a delight. To an encore they responded with "The Hunter's Song" which was equally well done. Runs and counter work offered no obstacles to these young vocalists and veterans of long standing could scarcely have done better. Miss Nellie Ahkman opened the program with a cornet solo and between parts one and two Miss Burns was presented with a prize for highest percentage in the harmony and theory class. The conservatory under Mr. Bonelli's efficient direction is broadening and enlarging so rapidly that it has been found necessary in the past few months to add another teacher to the piano department and Rocco Laruja has been secured to assist in the violin department. The secret of success lies probably in Mr. Bonelli's enthusiasm and his own assertion that he loves the work.

The concert at Hopkins Institute on Thursday evening, January sixteenth was under the direction of Sir Henry Heyman a thorough success. A good program embraced numbers by Madame Joseph Beringer who sang the "Esser Misto" from Flotow's "Martha," besides Schumann's "Widmung," "When the Heather Blooms," by Joseph Beringer and "The Merry Brown Thrush," by Buck; Mr. Julian Eisenbach, who gave two numbers in a sweet, mellow baritone; Miss Pearl Conness, who played Svendsen's "Romanze" for the violin in beautiful style, and Mr. R. H. Hunt, who rendered some old English songs very sweetly. Mr. Emil Cruells as usual opened and closed the program with numbers on the grand organ. There was a large and appreciative attendance.

At the Haber dramatic recital on Thursday evening there was a full house which listened to a varied program with interest. Albert Elkus of Sacramento and Harry Samuels the violinist accompanied by Miss Teresa Ehrman gave the musical numbers. Mr. Samuels always plays well and this occasion was no exception to the general rule, his numbers being greatly enjoyed. Young Mr. Elkus in a Greig sonata and Listz's "Rhapsodie" did, as always, excellent work. His technique is surprisingly finished for so young a player, and his numbers were both warmly encored.

A feast of reason and a flow of soul is before us in the Nordica and Hoffmann recitals. It is not often we have two such treats in one season and the attendance at both is bound to be very large, as Nordica is a prime favorite here and Hoffman's reputation even to those who have never heard his wonderful playing would be enough to draw a full house.

Across the bay three chamber music concerts are announced at Lisser hall of Mills college, for January twenty-fifth, February eighth and February twenty-second. There will be sonatas for violin and piano by Louis Lisser and Giulio Minetti selected from Mozart, Beethoven (the Kreutzer), Arthur Foote, Grieg, Scharwenka and Rubinstein, besides which Mrs. Edward Schneider accompanied by her husband will give a number of select vocal solos on each program, on the second of which appears "A Cycle of Songs—Frauen libe und Leben" by Schumann. The concerts will doubtless be largely patronized.

Alexander Stewart the violinist of Oakland gave a recital by his pupils at the Unitarian church of Oakland last evening with a fine program, in which Miss Beulah George, Edwin Dunbar Crandall, Ernest McCandlish, Lowell Redfield and Harry Carleton assisted in vocal numbers and Wm. B. King as organist and accompanist. There were violin solos by pupils and an orchestra under Mr. Stewart's direction which rendered some choice numbers.

The Nordica Recitals

In regard to the Nordica song recitals, the first of which is dated for Tuesday evening, February fourth, the programs are most happily selected to please the many. Some of the numbers have become endeared to us through the Grau seasons of grand opera. "Voi Che Sapeti" from "The Marriage of Figaro" will ever be reminiscent of Fritzi Scheff and her inimitable Cherubino, Brunnhilde's "Call" from the "Walkure" is something inseparable from Nordica herself and sung by the great diva as no one else can possibly do it. In addition there are simple things that speak of emotions and reach the heart in a quieter way—ballads and songs from MacDowell, d'Hardelot, Allitsen, Vidal, Hahn, Delibes, Greig, Schumann, Rubenstein and Strauss. This for the first concert, with a Chopin number, the Polonaise in C sharp minor, to be rendered by Mr. Simmons, a pianist who comes well recommended. The second and third concerts, for February sixth and eighth, are equally attractive and of operatic numbers offer Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin," the grand aria from the Hungarian opera, "Laslos" by Erkel, and the celebrated "Polonaise" from "Mignon." "The Elilland" Song Cycle (von Felitz), Handel's "Angels Ever Bright and Fair" and many other beautiful and some familiar things appear among the vocal numbers. Mr. Simmons has the "Barcarolle" (Rubenstein and "Polish Dance" (Scharwenka on the second program and the "Spinning Song" (Wagner-Liszt) on the third. There will, owing to the nature of the concerts, be a great deal of enthusiasm felt concerning them and without doubt a large attendance.

The Burrowes Method

An entirely new system of teaching music to children has recently been introduced to our city by Mrs. Frances Williams of Van Ness Seminary. Mrs. Williams went about the work systematically. After getting all the information possible concerning the different musical kindergarten methods she selected the Burrowes as being the most comprehensive; then she mastered it herself by studying under Katherine Burrowes, the founder of the system, after which she secured all the Normal rights for Central California. She has already started several teachers in the same line of work. The Burrowes Musical Kindergarten is an entirely new system intended to reach the comprehension of children from six to ten years of age. Music, that formerly in its rudiments was a bugbear to the little ones, by this inviting system becomes a delight to them. The little ones are taught in classes and the music hour is looked forward to with joy instead of dread. The theoretical part, which is usually inexpressibly wearisome to children, is by this method presented to them by gay-colored charts and bright painted blocks accompanied by jolly little songs, every line of which conveys a musical fact that is being fixed in their minds. The child's first exercise is musically attractive and must be memorized the same as the exercises that follow. First, the muscles of the waists and fingers are developed by gymnastics practiced in class with a lilting accompaniment which they sing during the exercises. Touch and finger action are taught at the Virgil clavier; then the child is prepared for piano work. In the meantime the ear has been developed by the admirable Burrowes system of ear training. After the first three months, sight reading becomes a part of each lesson. The Burrowes Musical Kindergarten Method is a finished and complete musicl system of elementary instruction and a most perfect foundation for a higher and more advanced musical education. Mrs. Wiiliams has large classes of children in Oakland, Alameda and other towns as well as in San Francisco. All of them are doing admirable work under this system. She also has as well a class of teachers whom she is preparing to carry on the work. It was Mrs. Williams who introduced the Virgil clavier to this coast.

The musicale at the studio of Miss Elizabeth Westgate, 1117 Paru street, Alameda, was one of the choicest ever given in that delightful place, and the program was intensely enjoyed by some sixty invited guests. Miss Grace Carroll's deep contralto furnished the vocal numbers and she is said never to have sung better; besides which there were concerted numbers by Miss Westgate and Alexander Stewart for piano and violin, which past experience tells me were finely rendered. The program was as follows: Sonata for piano and violin, in E minor, Mozart, Miss Westgate and Mr. Stewart; "In the Sacred Forest," from Arminius, Bruch, Miss Grace Carroll; sonata for piano and violin, op. 45, Greig, Miss Westgate and Mr. Stewart; songs, "The Young Nun," Schubert, "Morgeno send ich Dir die Veilechen," Draeseke, "Elegie" (with violin obligato) Massenet, Miss Grace Carroll; violin, with piano accompaniment, "Meditation," Glazounon; Majourka, Mlynarski, Mr. Stewart and Miss Westgate.

A Famous Opera Singer

Madame Inez Fabbri-Mueller, who next week, will have a testimonial concert, has been concerned in music here for many years, but previous to her settling for a permanency in San Francisco her career had been a brilliant one. Probably no vocal artist has created more roles than Madame Mueller, who numbers among operas introduced by herself, "The Jewess," "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "L'Africaine," "The Magic Flute," "La Dame Blanche," "Alexander Stradella," "Fra Diavola," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Fidelio," "Josef in Egypt," "Postillon von Longjumeau," "Mauser und Schlosser," "William Tell," "Templer und Judin" (Ivanhoe)—this between the years 1872 and 1877. Following are the names of prominent artists brought out by Madame Mueller during the same period of time: Anna Elser, Ida Valerga, Ilma de Murska, Fanny Francisca (Michelsen), Rose Relda (Adler), Jacob Mueller, Carl Spiegler, Carl Formes, Pietro Bacci, Theodor Habermann, Ugo Talbo, Fritz Lafontaine and Theodore Wachtel—all names of prominence in the musical world.

First of the New Series

The officers and members of the San Francisco Symphony Society are highly gratified at the result of the season sale for the second series of three symphony concerts. The subscription list has been large and that the Grand Opera House will be crowded on the Friday afternoons of January thirty-first, and February fourteenth and twenty-eighth, is a surety. Director Steindorff's coming programs have been carefully chosen and that for next Friday is: Symphony, New World, Dvorak; overture, Euryanthe, Weber; suite, The Nutcracker, Tschaikowsky; Rhapsodie Espagnol, Lalo. The sale of seats will begin at Sherman Clay and Co.'s next Tuesday morning at nine o'clock, the prices being one dollar and a half, one dollar, seventy-five cents, and fifty cents. The concert will begin at a quarter after three o'clock, the usual time.

The Pasmore Recital

In spite of the inclemency of the weather there was a good attendance at the Pasmore concert on Tuesday night and a program was given abounding in good things musical. Part one was essentially classic in character, the first number being the Beethoven trio beautifully rendered by the Pasmore children, Mary, Susan and Dorothy. Number two was Beethoven's exquisite "Adelaide," sung with fine expression by Mr. Pasmore and winning an enthusiastic encore. The "Air for G string" by Bach was one of the gems of the program and was played by Mary Pasmore accompanied by a string quartet composed of Dorothy Pasmore, Messrs. Nauman, Taubles and Pasmore. The number was exquisitely given and was applauded until the players consented to repeat it in full. Mary Pasmore is beginning to show in her work something far greater than ordinary talent. She not alone plays correctly, with a strong, supple wrist and correct bowing, but she makes her instrument speak. There is a serious-mindedness about this young artist that predicts volumes for future success in an artistic career, and it is the more to be remarked as she has only just entered her teens. In the Bach air there was dignity combined with ineffable sweetness and soulfulness. Each tone was brought out with velvety smoothness yet with the strength and power behind it one does not often hear except from an artist of far greater years and experience. Little Dorothy had a solo on her cello, the "Concert Piece" by Klengel which displayed to advantage the fine technique she has acquired and gave her some difficult execution to master which she handled splendidly. In the trio Susan, the young pianiste, had a difficult accompaniment which seemed but mere play to the well trained little fingers. For the rest of the program there was also much of interest. Mrs. Charles Hughes of Oakland proved a charming singer and gave four of Horatio Parker's quaint English songs in a voice of uncommon sweetness and with delightful expression. She is a lied singer of uncommon ability and her talents will win recognition for her in this line particularly. A quartet composed of Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Basford, Messrs Nowlan and Pasmore, sang two part songs by John Harraden Pratt of this city, Serenade and "Lend Me Your Fillet, Love," of which the latter showed the greater originality and was very pleasing. Both won appreciative encores. Mrs. Gardner's Jewel Song from "Faust" was finely done and sung in full without notes. It is the best work this young singer has yet done in public and places her a good mark higher in the ranks. The entire number was sung in Italian and showed to the full the sweetness of quality and the flexibility of her voice. Mr. McCoy's original songs sung by Mrs. Basford, won credit for both singer and author. Mr. McCoy accompanied them himself and certainly no singer could have given them a more fitting interpretation than Mrs. Basford, whose deep, rich contralto seemed wedded to the sentiment of each song. "Would You" I liked the best. Strikingly original both in sentiment and the music that describes it, the song is a gem and will stand hearing many times. "When Love Passed By" and a "June Song" were the two others, the latter charming in its lilting sweetness and made the more pleasurable for the quaint running accompaniment. The number so took the audience that insistent demand brought a repetition. There is but one more of the Pasmore series, to be given on February seventh, but those who have had the pleasure of hearing them all or in part, will look forward with pleasure to the next series with the fine programs it is Mr. Pasmore's delight to arrange.

A BIG LIFE INSURANCE POLICY

Life insurance policies for one million dollars are rarities even in this day of large fortunes, where boys and girls talk of millions as their grandfathers discussed thousands. An average life insurance policy, of a rich man, is fifty thousand dollars. Sometimes he carries policies for this amount in various companies, the total aggregating a quarter of a million dollars. A two hundred and fifty thousand policy taken out in one company on a single life is one of the insurance happenings that does not occur every day. And a million dollar policy carried by one man in one company is so seldom heard of that the risk would, if it came to the ears of a yellow journal, entitle its holder to be written up in a pictorial Sunday supplement. Yet a policy for one million dollars was paid out by the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York last Saturday, and it was only recorded in a few lines of press despatch. The policy was carried by Frank H. Peavey, the millionaire of Minneapolis. His recent death was followed by the application for the payment of his policy in the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, and the check for the amount was, without any undue red tape, sent to the beneficiary. Fancy a check for one million dollars! Yet the Mutual Life was not in the least embarrassed by the payment. It is the oldest established life insurance company in America and has a national reputation for its steadfastness, conservatism and probity. It has a San Francisco agency, which has had as its manager, since pioneer days, Mr. A. B. Forbes. The Mutual Life Insurance building at the corner of California and Sansome streets is one of the prominent landmarks of the downtown business quarter.

A Melodramatic Novel

To those good souls who demand a happy ending to all their fiction, one can heartily commend Miss Wilkins' 'Portion of Labor," for not since the days of our grandmothers has there been such a wholesale apportionment of good things, and setting to rights of all wrongs in the final chapter as we are treated to in this book. All the characters are drawn up in a semi-circle and there is a perfect Christmas tree distribution of hearts' desires. The old couplet,—

"Come, Philander, let's be a-marchin',
Every one his true love a s'archin' would have made an appropriate heading for the final chapter, for the characters march off the stage in pairs to the music of wedding bells, and if Andrew Brewster were not set on to tell us in so many words that the portion of labor is growth in character, we might imagine it was getting married. As a picture of life in a factory town of New England this book is probably all but photographic. As a biography of Ellen Brewster, it is satisfactory, but as a contribution to the question of the relations of capital and labor it is both inadequate and absurd. Ellen Brewster is the superior child of an operative in one of the shoe factories. The Brewsters belong to that class of New Englanders which has almost a superstitious reverence for book-learning, so Ellen is given the advantage of a course in the high school. It would be superfluous to add that she was the valedictorian of her class were it not for the remarkable events which hung upon that graduation. The high school teachers of New England must be different from those of any other community, since Ellen took occasion to score Capital and exalt Labor, and the school authorities were as much surprised as any one else. It is generally believed that these essays are submitted for inspection and correction, and read and rehearsed before the teachers, or at least the principal, precisely as any other semi-theatrical appearance is prepared for. But, be that as it may, Ellen'sefforts attracts the attention of the nephew of the owner of the principal shoe factory, and his doom is sealed. Notwithstanding the introduction of another lover, an erstwhile schoolmate, and the seeming periods of uncertainty and deliberation on the part of Ellen, we know the golden plum is hers, and can afford to ignore any hints that something else MIGHT happen. Owing to family misfortunes Ellen gives up her college career and seeks work in the factory. Why it should be considered any more of a come-down to her than to the daughter of any of the other workers is not so clear, but Ellen is regarded as a martyr to duty and circumstances. Of course, it would never do for her not to attempt to write a novel, and one can be thankful Miss Wilkins was wise enough to choke her off early in the game, but one has to wonder why nine out of ten heroines in nine out of ten novels have to be set at it. There is more of the stuff of the real heroine in Abbie Atkins, under-fed, half-clothed, and with no more education than the law demands, the eldest of a numerous family, and without the blue eyes and golden curls which are of so much assistance to Ellen. Incidentally there are throughout the story, strikes, lockouts, and the ill feeling and aggressions which grow out of them, and one cannot question the realism of the hardships which follow a shut-down in mid-winter, when the men gather to talk it over, and the women supply what income there is by crocheting woolen hoods or sewing on cotton wrappers, day and night for a few cents apiece. The factory hands are well presented. Miss Wilkins has lost none of her charm of style or minuteness of observation. Judging by the length of "The Portion of Labor," she must have designed it for an important work, but its chief value lies not in the attempts to set the feet of capital and labor in the same path, but in the depicting of the private life of the operators and in the picturing of the individual characters. [Harpers, publishers.]

Dwellers in Vans

Thousands of people must have gone flat-hunting in New York or elsewhere and had experiences approximating those of the "Van-Dwellers," and to them and those who know them, the little recital will not fail to prove interesting, while to those who have been spared the ordeal it will serve as a sort of litany to which they may devoutly respond: "Good Lord, deliver us." The dedication is "To those who have lived in flats, to those who are living in flats and to those who are thinking of living in flats," and the Scriptural quotation on the title page, "We were strangers and they took us in," is not to be accepted in the Scriptural sense. The family of four, newly-arrived from the West, and with neither theoretical nor experiential knowledge to guide them, set out in search of a home in the metropolis, and their various haps and mishaps, with the department store, the moving-man, the janitor, the hired girl and the landlord are much more entertaining to read about than to have encountered. They learn that large, light, sunny rooms, as per advertisement, are apt to turn out small, dark and cold cells, and the attractive apartments in the new jerry-built erection all but fall apart before the end of the first six months. Steam heat and other luxuries are always out of season, and in general, "things are not what they seem." The habit of house-hunting becomes chronic, and the younger members of the family, the "Precious Ones," from being taken about with their elders, soon learn the "lingo," and make moving and house-hunting a favorite play. They become so fascinated with the idea of change of residence that they ask to be taken "to look at flats," and plaintively inquire when they are going to move. After having tried old houses and new, up-town and down, first floors and more exalted elevations, the "Van Dwellers" come to the sensible conclusion that they will no longer be tossed about from pillar to post, but have a home of their own. Thus far the recital of their experience has been made with the humor which comes when the actual experience is safely in the past, but the closing words are in a more serious vein. They are a plea for charity in the consideration of janitor and hired girl, as well as for the inhabitants of the other apartments. The conclusion to be drawn from the book is that it is best not to live in a flat, but if one must, one must make the best of it. "The Van Dwellers" is a very small book—only one hundred and ninety pages, but there is more humor to the page than to anything outside of Mark Twain. It can be read at a sitting, and it very certainly will be by the one who takes it up. [Published by the J. F. Taylor Company of New York for Albert Bigelow Paine.] —The Bookworm.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

ALBERT MAHONY, Clerk.
By THOS. F. O'NEIL, Deputy Clerk.

GONE WITH THE GOO GOO EYES.

Where is the slang of yesterday
That folk to use saw fit;
The classic "keep on guessing,"
The short expressive "nit";
And say, "would n't that jar you?"
"You're it," "You simple jay,"
Is dead, gone and forgotten,
The slang of yesterday.
What has become of "off on base,"
Likewise the "goo goo eyes";
Where is he "tumbled," or was "on,"
The "I'm from Missouri" prize?

The good old "search me" idiocy
Has passed likewise away,
"Away back" to oblivion,
The slang of yesterday.
Where is the frozen "marble heart,"
Or genial, gay "glad hand"?
The "frosty guy" that "freezes" you,
The thing that "beat the band"?
What was the end of "dropped to it,"
Oh, can you tell me, pray,
Where are those "dopey" sayings
The slang of yesterday?

—B. W.

THE STRUGGLE IN SOCIETY.

"At last," said Mrs. Gilflory, "I guess we have eclipsed the Astor-Gastors as entertainers. I've fixed it up with a society reporter to put in the papers that our big ball cost forty thousand dollars."

"But the Astor-Gastors claim that theirs cost sixty thousand dollars."

"Yes, but we're going to publish affidavits with ours with photographs of the caterers' and the florists' bills." —The Butler

THE POETS OF TO-DAY.

How write the singers of the day?
Alas! and still alas!
Three sonnets for the house rent,
A love-song for the gas!

No rest for all the weary—
No gentle, kind relief;
An ode to pay the coal man,
A ballad for the beef.

And so they sing forever
And feel the wrath of rods;
Far from the ancient altars
The incense of the gods.

A NEW BRANCH OF LABOR

The new School of Copper-plate, and Card Engraving and Designing established by F. W. Gardam offers a splendid field for ambitious young Californians desiring to enter some business or profession whose ranks are not already over-crowded. Mr. Gardam was formerly with Tiffany & Co., New York, Payot Upham & Co. of San Francisco, and lately with Lowman & Hanford of Seattle. The scarcity of competent artists and engravers on copper and steel caused Mr. Gardam to conceive the idea of founding this school. There is no more lucrative craft or profession, for Mr. Gardam himself has never accepted less than two hundred and fifty dollars per month, his services being in great demand at that figure. From seventy-five to one hundred dollars is the average monthly pay, though in many cases it reaches one hundred and fifty and two hundred dollars. For a moderate compensation Mr. Gardam now offers in his School of Engraving and Designing the opportunity of acquiring a degree of skill in these branches.

OUR OPINION

Soaking the Globe in Sections

Just now while our farmers and miners are praying for rain it is encouraging to note that other sections of the globe are being plentifully soaked: it may yet come our turn before the season is over. This city has had seven inches so far against thirteen inches for the same period last year, so we're way behind our average; that's why the water sellers look so luguorious. But if there is a lamentable winter dryness about our doorways our next-door neighbor, Hawaii, is catching a good drenching. Ookala, in Hilo, the other day was soused with twenty inches in twenty-four hours. On Monday night it began raining in Papaikow and by seven o'clock next morning the gauge showed thirteen inches, the water was pouring over the top, and of course all record was lost. That same night over nine inches were sluiced over Waiaken and Pepeekeo was soused in over ten inches of rain. Lanpahoehoe got a ten-inch drenching in five hours and a lot of other places were water-soaked, but Ookaha with its twenty inches in twenty-four hours held high-water mark when the rain was over. That's the banner fall for the Islands for one day, but other places on the globe have beaten that record. Bombay once caught twenty-four inches in twenty-four hours; the Kasi Hills, India, thirty inches and Genoa thirty. Gibralter carries the rain banner of the world for a twenty-four hours' soaking: it is thirty-three inches. The wettest place in the world is Cherrapungi, southwestern Assam, which has an annual average rainfall of six hundred and ten inches. In 1861 it secured the marvelous record of nine hundred and five inches. Contrast that with our perennially dry little Yuma, glad to get a three-inch sprinkle each year. Port Said has to be satisfied with two inches and carries the dry banner of the world with that figure. Certainly it deserves its reputation when one remembers that the average rainfall of the globe is thirty-six inches. On this coast, Tattosh Island, Washington, is the heaviest soaked place. It has an average rainfall of ninety-two inches each year. Hatteras carries the banner for the East coast, with sixty-six inches.

Arbitration Wins Another Victory

Arbitration and conciliation have just won a notable victory in Boston by preventing a teamsters' strike which threatened to rival in its consequences the one that broke out in this city. In the Eastern case, however, the teamsters asked for shorter hours and higher pay: the employers answered that to grant these demands would be ruinous to their business and harmful to the city's trade interests. The employees were about to be called out when the State Board of Arbitration, backed by the Governor, the Mayor and the President of the Chamber of Commerce, stepped in with propositions of a compromise. They handled the matter so reasonably that the teamsters receded from almost half their demands and the employers conceded the remainder. Had the teamsters gone out as they threatened the confusion and loss to business would have been immense. The five thousand teamsters have affiliations with other unions and the strike would have unquestionably reached into other quarters through sympathy, as it did in this city. Boston is to be congratulated on the outcome and both teamsters and employers have saved a great deal besides a big pot of money in reaching such a temperate conclusion. This is the second notable victory arbitration has gained since the first of this year.

The "New" Washington

When the "new and the greater" tide swept over the country, a short time ago, leaving such landmarks as the "new" nation, "greater" New York, "greater" Chicago and "greater" San Francisco, the statesmen at the Capital were uplifted by its mighty sweep and determined on a "new" Washington. Their labors have just been crystallized in an exhibition at the Corcoran Art Gallery, Washington, of a plaster miniature of the proposed "Twentieth Century Capital." The display is intended as an object lesson to the country at large. Something like a year ago, and just after the "new" Washington Committee had thoroughly discussed plans and ideas, three of the leading experts of the East were dispatched abroad to study the architectural features and landscape effects of the capitals of Europe. The present exhibition is the result of their labors. The scope of the proposed work, however, is so vast that no one dare venture to guess at the time of completion and the cost. But if only the skeleton of the idea is carried out, and that might be done within a decade if historic memorials, fountains, bridges, quays and parks are constructed as provided for, Washington will certainly become the most beautiful capital in the world. In the main, the "new" Washington will follow the original plan designed by L'En-fant and accepted by Washington, with such modifications as will suit the varying architectural and park problems raised by the needs of the Government and the growth of the city. One of the greatest "new" problems to contend with since L'Enfant's time is the handling of the many railroad lines which cut up the city. Fortunately, there is a railroad architect on the Commission, a man of eminent talent, and he has devised a plan which everybody declares is an inspiration. By it all the railroads are to enter the city at a northeast point. There the most beautiful depot in the world will be erected. It will cost three million dollars and be constructed of white marble: it will be nearly one hundred feet wider than the Capitol. This magnificent structure will face on a plaza six hundred feet in width where great bodies of troops can be assembled. Among other great improvements will be the reclamation of the Potomac flats. These are to be converted into water-side promenades and parks with granite walls and wide Venetian steps leading to the water. The reclaimed space is to be laid out in stately avenues and dotted with marble fountains, statues and monuments to the memory of great men. Only public buildings will face the Capitol. The Mall, originally designed to form a park-like connection between the Capitol and the White House, is to be restored. All private dwellings fronting on the White House are to give way to buildings of a semi-public character. A superb memorial is to be erected to the memory of Lincoln. The long island in the Potomac is to be transformed into a park with shaded drives and picturesque waterfalls. This portion of Washington is to be the little Venice. The entire river front is to be changed. With this birds-eye view of the "new" capital on exhibit before them the Committeemen in charge will be able to complete whatever skeleton of the plan is selected without losing their sense of proportion.

Another Attempt to Prohibit a Play

The presentation of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" on the stage has raised the wrath of the Albert Sidney Johnson chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy of Louisville, Kentucky, and they have petitioned the State Legislature to prohibit the show. Previous to this, however, they opened the attack by trying to get the manager of the opera house to take it off his boards. His business acumen prompted him to reply that "Uncle Tom seems to be holding his own pretty well and the war has been over for thirty-six years, anyhow." Beaten off in this quarter the zealous Daughters roused their partisans all over Kentucky and urged them to make a State fight over the matter. In this wise a giant petition reached the Legislature and its ardent advocates now declare they have assurances that a bill will be passed forbidding the presentation throughout the State. It seems rather singular that the Daughters of the Confederacy have not thought of a far simpler way to kill "Uncle Tom's Cabin," or any other play they object to, and that is to remain away from the performances. Theatres are run to make money, and when any manager discovers he has not a drawing show he is only too glad to change the bill. Another plan would be to hire John L. Sullivan to play the part of Simon Legree throughout the South. He is said to enact the character in a holy-terror way; certainly he proves himself a terror to the Uncle Tom in the same cast. Very recently he essayed the part in Boston and lambasted Uncle Tom so enthusiastically and true to nature that at the end of the performance the supers had to roll the much-wolloped slave in cotton and soak him in arnica. He stoutly refused to go on the stage again with John L. Sullivan even if the latter played the part as a living picture holding a stuffed whip. What's the matter with the Daughters of the Confederacy employing the redoubtable John L. to tour the South as Simon Legree? In a short season he would easily wallop all the spirit out of ambitious Uncle Toms and his cabin would have to be demolished and the hounds sent to the pound-yard. A cursory glance at this Uncle Tom pother seems to warrant the belief that the earth may be easily rolled over him without appealing to any long-winded State legislature.

Latch-Keys for the Wives

The greatest blow at the husbands' monopoly of the latch-key was delivered by an Oakland Solomon last week, when he laid down the decision that a wife has as much right as her husband to remain out all night without answering inquisitive questions as to where she had spent her time. She may turn up her nose disdainfully at his ireful and impertinent inquiries, she may rally him with badinage, or she may blandly fib to him: the learned judge says all these privileges are in the same package which he has just handed to the sex. Henceforth she is half-owner in the pass-key, with all the rights, titles and privileges thereto; the law allows it and the court awards it. Thus has she had thrust suddenly upon her the very arrogance of tremendous power but, as in the case with the magic skin, there are harrowing moments connected with its use. It's all very well to sail airily up to the front door at 3 a. m., and ostentatiously admit yourself with the pass-key, but once inside there's that old, old terror-striking ogre to lay: "My dear, where have you been?" A night-cap taken with every homeward step cannot bring sleep or ease to the belated pilgrim who faces the grim wrinkled front of that insistent, questioning ogre. Time cannot lessen nor custom soothe its crushing effects. Before it, flippancy, fibbing and persiflage are as froth in a wintry gale. It is safe to say that that ogre's look, manner and actions have kept more husbands home nights and rusted more useless night-keys than the marital decisions of all the courts in Christendom. What over-anxious Benedict is scared by the doubt that any woman will forego the privilege of asking that momentous question for the dubious right of answering it? Go to Cupid's court, dullard; consider his tips and be wise, else this difference over latch-keys may raise more than the old-time ogre in the household, as it did in the case of the Oakland couple.

Latest Kind of "Free" Libraries

A commercial organization is offering to furnish the means for establishing free libraries in all the small towns of Indiana. It is an advertising scheme, pure and simple, and one that it is a wonder no one has introduced before on the same scale. If their offer is accepted the company will have the privilege of inserting pages of advertising matter in all the books furnished the library and it is confidently expected that this form of exploitation will prove as profitable as other forms of advertising. Some time ago a struggling congregation in a backwoods community contemplated laying in a new supply of hymn books. One day they were agreeably surprised to have a proposition submitted to them by a firm of patent medicine manufacturers, by which, for the privilege of inserting some advertising matter, the needed books would be donated free of any expense. The offer was gratefully accepted. Then came a startling discovery: when the congregation attempted to make use of their gift, they discovered that instead of a few leaves of advertising matter inserted at the back, one line of every hymn had been omitted, and in its place there was substituted the name of the cure-all. It is not likely that the Indiana company intends to do anything so flagrant as this. Still, if they choose to do their advertising matter in this way, they have as good a right as Carnegie, or any one else. All these apparent gifts have turned out to be white elephants, and it would be well for the rural communities to investigate thoroughly before they bind themselves by burdensome promises and obligations. These are cases where one had best not only look the gift horse in the mouth, but carefully examine his teeth and insides. They belong to the class of horses that the sharp-witted Greeks left before Troy.

The Saunterer

An Old Story Uncovered in Court

The recent marriage of one of the sons of a prominent physician to a dashing divorcee and a question that arises in the settlement of the estate of a well-known lawyer and capitalist who died very suddenly the other day have brought up for momentary consideration an old story which two families have tried their best to bury. The chances are its bones will forever be laid to rest when the court has finally disposed of several details connected with the lawyer's estate. The lawyer was noted for his "thrift and economy" and when some six years ago the story leaked out that he was under the thumbscrews of a blackmailer society pricked up ears. Cherchez la femme is an old aphorism and society quickly located her. Then it came out that she demanded six thousand dollars as the price of peace. Furthermore she stipulated that the money was to be paid to a prominent physician. The attorney groaned but circumstances forced him to acquiesce.

Society Doubly Shocked

Then came the second shock to society. The physician, so the woman claimed, glued his hands to the money and refused to turn it over to her. Attorney, friends, woman and everybody who had a finger in the pie tried his or her best to reach the money but in vain: the physician held on like grim death. The woman thought it would prove an easier task to go back and get another six thousand dollars out of the lawyer, but the latter steadfastly refused to be bled a second time. A lively three-cornered fight followed. In the midst of it the woman lost control of her judgment, gave way to her tongue, and the details of the whole unsavory matter came out. The lawyer made no bones of declaring that the woman and the doctor were standing in cahoots to squeeze him. The irate woman strenuously denied this and declared she herself was the injured party because the doctor had got away with all the money that had appeared. When the smoke of battle, and the charges and counter charges had somewhat cleared away, the doctor's 'scutcheon was so badly smudged that his wife packed her trunks and went to Europe. At the time of his wedding the physician was supposed to have made a decidedly fine catch financially. Later, however, his father-in-law failed in business and they were left dependent on his professional earnings which were then very large. By the time his wife returned from Europe, Mrs. Grundy was busy with the next scandal and the family resumed its old position in society.

Distanced His Brother in the Race

The marriage of Maxwell McNutt and Maude Treadwell was not so much of a surprise to the relatives of the young couple as outsiders may imagine. Mrs. McNutt has always taken a friendly interest in her new daughter-in-law and at one time the young heiress lived with the McNutts. As her social stratum was several layers below that of the McNutt girls the fact caused some comment, but she settled for this exclusive chaperonage and was evidently a welcome guest. However, she herself soon decided to try other quarters. At one time Fletcher McNutt, who is now busy tacking London degrees to his M.D., was supposed to be devoted to Maude Treadwell but brother Maxwell has won out.

Will Wed on Shrove Tuesday

The wedding of Miss Phoebe Winslow Painter and Dr. Gardner Perry Pond, at the First Congregational church on the evening of Shrove Tuesday, at nine o'clock, will be the smartest affair held in that edifice since the wedding of Miss Ives and Henry Crocker. The invitations have been issued by Mrs. Bina Staples Yemans, aunt of the bride-to-be. Shrove Tuesday comes on Mardi Gras night, but society can easily take in the wedding and the ball as well. The engagement of Miss Painter and Dr. Pond was announced last year and is an eminently pleasing one to the relatives of both. The bride to be is a granddaughter of the late D. J. Staples and since her parents' death has resided, with her sister and brother, with her mother's people.

The Approaching Tramp of Soldiers

At Army Headquarters it is whispered that the Twenty-ninth Infantry, now at Fort Sheridan, Illinois, will soon bivouac at the Presidio, preparatory to sailing for service in the Philippines. The women of the regiment are in a quandary whether or not to follow their husbands. Those who think of daring the transport trip are Mrs. Reaves, Mrs. Miller, Mrs. Ely, Mrs. Jamerson, Mrs. Waldron, Mrs. Twyman and Miss Woodward. Miss Woodward will probably accompany her step-father, Lieutenant Colonel Forbes. She has been quite a social success in Annapolis, the past two or three years. Mrs. Jamerson spent last winter in Alaska with her husband of the Seventh Infantry, Captain Ely's former regiment. Mrs. Miller was with Lieutenant Miller on his former trip to the Philippines. Mrs. Waldron and Mrs. Twyman are November brides.

Speaking of San Francisco Women

"The Widow," who passed through here recently from the Philippines, has a number of sprightly comments on things San Franciscan, in the bright New York weekly for which she writes. In speaking of her own sex here, she says: "My first impression of the women of my country—San Francisco women—was that they were the most beautiful things on earth. Every one of them was a dream. Complexions were clear and brilliant, and skins like satin. Belts had an additional tip in front even at the risk of deformity and of rivaling Egyptian dancing girls, and shoes peeping out from under some of the skirts were a marvel. Enormously long spools were being worn for heels on feet of all shapes. It was no longer necessary that the foot be of Southern aristocracy or a descendant of blue-blooded ancestry and the shoes be made to fit the arch and curves of acknowledged beauty. It was now the fashion, and at a glance I saw the American shoemaker had at last struck the secret of manufacture which brought the price within the scope of limited pocketbooks. The genuine French heel, which the dealers had declared for years to be death to all purchasers, was not so unpopular. It was now cheap. It was also an imitation. But neither dealer nor purchaser was worrying about death. Price does not make such a difference."

In Honor of a Feline Pet

The importance of the Requas across the bay is not exaggerated, as this little story illustrates. The Requas, be it known, have a lot in that show-place among Oakland's garden spots, the cemetery. An old gardener has orders to keep their lot in perfect condition and he naturally considers the Requas as grand as any of royal blood. Not long ago a monument was raised in the enclosure especially commended to the gardener's care. On the shaft appears the simple word, "Requiescat." The ancient wielder of spade and hose was showing one of his friends over the cemetery the other day, and pausing before the new monument the visitor asked: "Who's that for?"

"Well, what do you think?" answered his friend, "them Requas has gone and raised a monument to their cat."

Helen Gould's Aunt

Not everybody knows that the Goulds have an aunt in Los Angeles who is as philanthropic in her way as is her wealthier niece, who is shortly to visit California. This benevolent lady is Mrs. Anna Hough. Her husband at his death left her with a fortune larger than she could spend for everyday luxuries so she devotes a large portion of the surplus in trying to help others. She is a devout Methodist and to societies of that persuasion she has handsomely contributed. She gave one hundred thousand dollars to the endowment fund of the University of Southern California, thus following in a more circumscribed path the footsteps of Mrs. Phoebe Hearst and Mrs. Jane Stanford.

Eva Withrow Painted Her Portrait

Violet Lady Rosslyn, whose husband, the much-written-about Earl of Rosslyn, divorced her last week on desertion grounds, is very well known to those artistic Californians who have been admitted to London's ultra Bohemia. Eva Withrow's portrait of Lady Violet was one of the most talked of pictures in London when it was placed on exhibition. It shows the noted beauty with her hair in floating curls and reminds one of the portraits that Sir Joshua Reynolds painted of London beauties of his day.

Breaking the Bank at Monte Carlo

Lord Rosslyn's attempt to break the bank at Monte Carlo, according to a well known local clubman who has tried the same game, was all nonsense because there is no "breaking the bank," telegraph reports of Schwab's or anybody else's success to the contrary. At each bank, or game, the management sets a limit for the day's loss and when that limit is reached the courteous croupier announces that there will be no more play at that table for the day. It is a clever and excellent way of cutting short one's losses. Monte Carlo gladly welcomes all men with "systems." The management is highly delighted when some special system makes a big winning for really there is no better way of advertising the place. Nothing pays better than an occasional heavy loss for it sustains the public in the belief that there really is a way to get the better of the bank. But the absurd fallacy that the bank was ever near being broken is disproved by the fact that Monte Carlo has paid magnificent dividends for a quarter of a century and has lived royally the while. Nobody in the principality pays any taxes and the Prince enjoys a truly princely income from the game. Even the cathedral, with the Bishop and clergy, is supported on the proceeds of gaming. Fifty years ago the place was bankrupt, over taxed and in a miserable condition. But ever since Francois Blanc opened up his gambling concession it has waxed fat and prosperous. Why shouldn't it? The wealthiest gamblers of the world support it.

Royal Cost of Running the Bank

But figures will give the best idea of its affluence and success. The direct expenses of the Casino itself amount to four million one hundred thousand dollars a year; that sum includes three million four hundred and fifty thousand for the management and pay of sixteen hundred employes. The gardens cost one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, while two hundred thousand dollars go towards paying for the theatres and the world-famous orchestra. The trifle of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars is set aside for the European press, for which it is supposed that scandals are passed lightly over and the bank's losses properly advertised. Something like sixty thousand dollars is spent annually to pay the home fares of people who are cleaned out. These are the mere expenses of the Casino, but observe that nowhere among them is any charge made to losses, nor is the name of the man who "broke the bank" anywhere given. But to hold this golden gambling privilege at Monte Carlo the management is also called upon to pay certain public bills. It gives to the Prince of Monaco two hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually for the right of running the bank; it pays for the maintenance of roads, railways, carnivals, races, not forgetting fifty thousand dollars a year for churches and schools. Outside of this it disburses one hundred thousand dollars a year for police, law courts and "general expenses" of the government. Altogether over five million dollars a year are drawn from the gamblers of Europe to pay for the privilege of trying to "break the bank" at Monte Carlo.

How a Big Winning was Made

"The most striking winning I saw on my visit there was made by a great Viennese banker at the rouge-et-noir table. It took place a few minutes before the ill-ventilated and stuffy rooms were to be closed for the night. The banker was so stout that he could hardly move; he had a great double chin, bulbous eyes with great pouches beneath, a skin half yellow, half leaden and the voice of a man being choked with his own obesity and a life of gross indulgence. But he was hugely wealthy and was playing high stakes, so everybody gathered around to watch him. He picked the red to win and played a game of double and quits. Red turned up once, twice, three times, four times and the pile before him mounted higher. It seemed as if his run of luck couldn't turn. The crowd went mad and as red succeeded red there arose a hum of surprise, terror, envy, every passion in a subdued murmur. In all the excitement the big, gross banker imperturbably watched the rolling ball. The croupier's last cry of 'red' was followed by the day's announcement that all games must close for the day. The banker slowly gathered in his winnings. In ten minutes with his run of luck he had won fifty thousand dollars. But I don't doubt the losses of the envious crowd of gamblers about him footed up as much and the money didn't come out of the bank's pocket."

Ambition of General Grant's Granddaughter

There is nothing new in the resolution of Vivian Sartoris to study with view to a professional career. Years ago, before she made her social debut, she expressed a desire to become an actress. At that time her friends regarded her aspiration as a romantic notion conceived by a novel-reading schoolgirl to help add to the family exchequer which her father's extravagancies had greatly reduced. Charles Frohman was expected to act as sponsor to the dramatic debut of General Grant's granddaughter. But the rumors gradually faded away into thin air. Miss Sartoris became a society bud and in time a belle, both in New York and London. Her engagement to a New Yorker, D. O. Nichols, was announced, a betrothal that came to naught.

Her Grandmother was an Actress

Then another engagement was wired across the continent—Miss Sartoris and Archibald Balfour. This has now been positively declared broken off, and the fair Vivian has asserted that she will marry nobody but will devote herself to study in Paris. Instead of the drama, her first love, she proposes to take up music. Her friends say she aims at the opera. There is no doubt that Miss Sartoris possesses remarkable talent. She has frequently appeared in amateur theatricals. She comes naturally by this love of the stage for the mother of Algernon Sartoris and the grandmother of his daughters Rosemary and Vivian, was one of the famous Kemble family of actors. She was a popular actress when Mr. Sartoris, an English gentleman, wooed her from public life.

She Inherits Her Father's Pluck

It is now fully nine years since that elegant representative of the British polisson, Mr. Algernon Charles Sartoris, passed away unlamented even by those of his own blood. The marriage of Nellie Grant with Sartoris was one of the events that should never have happened. Her family opposed it, her friends regretted it, but Nellie Grant had the same obstinacy in her character that was so strongly illustrated in her famous father when he penned that historic dispatch, "I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer." She had set her heart on the handsome Algernon and she got a brute. This same determination kept the abused wife from dragging her misery into the divorce court. To the end she bore up like a Spartan and never in any way tried to escape the result of her unfortunate infatuation. After his death she returned to Washington and made her home with her mother.

Greenway's Line of Beauties

Peter Marie of New York is famous for his collection of miniatures of beautiful women, and Ned Greenway is quite as renowned locally for his photographs of beauties of the South and West. All the Baltimore beauties, Mrs. Henry Clews, Jr., Mrs. Lee Tailer, Mrs. Jesse Tyson and Mrs. Archie Pell are here, but in all the places of honor in his rooms are the photographs of Fritzi Scheff in every conceivable pose and costume. When Greenway prepares to lead cotillons to the music of the harps on high he should catalogue his beauties and leave them to a public gallery.

The Famous Sheldon Photographs

The late Ed Sheldon's collection of society women's photographs was among the best and largest here. One of the side walls of his bedroom was covered with photographs. Everybody in local swelldom with any pretensions to being considered a beauty was in Mr. Sheldon's collection. I do not know who has the photographs now. Some of the subjects, I fancy, would not feel happy if their pictures should fall into strange hands, for there were instances where the costumes were inadequate to conceal charms that are usually hidden.

The Coming Event in Society

The Athearn Folger ball dated for the tenth promises to be the red-letter affair of the season. The lavish expenditure of money is prodigal enough to make old Nick Luning fidget in his grave. His daughter Clara, now Mrs. Folger, was always his favorite child, but even she could never hypnotize him into hospitality. On one memorable occasion he did give her a ball at the Palace hotel. The rest of the Lunings were greatly disturbed when they heard that Clara had really gained her father's consent for a ball. One of them went so far as to ask a specialist to examine Mr. Luning and determine whether he was suffering mental aberration. However the caterers and decorators declared that Mr. Luning's bargaining betrayed he had lost none of his skill in shaving down prices. Society worked up a lemonade thirst for the affair, but they reckoned without their hostess.

When Nick Luning Scattered His Gold

Clara Luning was not the girl to do things by halves and she "did" her father thoroughly. Champagne corks popped and there were piping hot birds and all the rest of the good things that go to make a supper successful. Nick Luning decorated a dim corner while the dancers glided to the dreamy waltzes —that was before the two-step was crowned king. 'Tis said the grim old capitalist even forgot to calculate the compound interest on his gilt-edge mortgages, so busily did his eyes follow his daughter. He rubbed his palms, that heretofore had only itched for gold, in pure glee at Clara's social triumph. But when supper came and wine melted like dew, the old gentleman grew taciturn. "You and I are getting old for this sort of thing," ventured his partner in order to provoke him into speech. "If God will forgive me this time, I'll never give another ball," old Nick solemnly answered. People have said that the money spent on that ball rankled as deep in his heart as the loss of the Blythe block, which he had always hoped to acquire on a mortgage.

But none of this penuriousness has clung to his fortune. Mrs. Folger is always ready to give pleasure to her friends or to help the needy. The favors for the coming german at Native Sons' hall were imported from Paris and the few who have had a peek at them are enthusiastic over their beauty. The Folgers have kept their town house partially closed all season and have lived quietly at their San Mateo home so this grand ball comes as a delightful surprise.

End of the "Thirty Million Dollar" Ball

The smart set has whetted its appetite for a piece de resistance to mark this season's menu as blue-ribboned and the Folger ball comes to satisfy its craving. Hors d'oeuvres in the shape of teas and luncheons, dinners and dances, but for dessert every one looks forward to the H. E. Huntington ball. And after all this anticipation that much talked about affair is to be but a dancing party. The invitations were sent over the 'phone which brands the affair as very informal. This is the first entertaining the Huntingtons have attempted since Uncle Collis willed them umpty-umpty millions. Small wonder society expected something "gorgeriferous" and christened the coming event the "thirty million dollar ball." But the telephone invitations made it look like thirty cents, and people have now given up all hope of the Huntingtons ever living up to their money. The Willard Huntington dance for Edith was on a very much more elaborate scale than this affair will be. They hired a hall for the occasion and spent a pretty penny considering that their share of the C. P. Huntington estate was only one hundred thousand dollars. But the H. E. Huntingtons are giving only a house dance which means that the guests will be few in number and no splurging in supper and decorations.

A Busy Day for the Invited

It will be given on the night of the fifth and on the evening of the same day Maude Mullins marries Dr. Clark. In the afternoon Mrs. Nathaniel Gray gives a luncheon to fifty guests in the red room of the Bohemian club so those who intend to take in all three affairs will be too tired anyway to grieve over the lack of splendor at the Huntington dance.

Mrs. Will Crocker had hoped to do something handsome for her niece, Miss Sperry, but the continued illness of one of her children has delayed her plans until too late to execute them as originally intended. Lent is on the wing and Mrs. Crocker had to hurry out cards for a dancing party before the social calendar was sealed. So the Folger ball will stand out in sharp relief as the "grand ball" of the season.

The Smart Set in a Rush

Unless the social arbitre calls "Whoa!" society women will surely go on a strike for shorter hours. Some idea of the way they are driven may be gathered by a glance at the cards out for today. The ladies are rushing hither and thither trying to at least say

"Howdy-do," at the three big teas. Mrs. Woods, Mrs. Centre and Mrs. Rawles, wife of the commanding officer at the Presidio, are all receiving and this is typical of the every-day rush. Well, one thing: this life trains a girl to do the lightning change act and vaudeville will come easy if stocks go down."

Succeeded Where Collis Failed

The fashionable world quite readily receives the Huntingtons these days, although the brainy founder of all their wealth struggled many years for social prestige and failed. C. P. Huntington dined in his great mansion alone, except for several dependants who were obliged to go there. Yet the H. E. and the Willard Huntingtons go everywhere. It is only with the debut of Edith, the prettiest of all the debutantes, that the Willard Huntingtons have gone out at all. They have lived extremely quietly and Willard hates to part with money as much as did the great C. P. Mrs. Huntington is the daughter of Harry Orndorf, an old-time sport and well known in this city.

Prince Poniatowski's Great Fight

Prince Poniatowski's coup d'etat on the grounds of the Dunphy residence in Milbrae was not achieved without strenuous exertions. The Prince has had few harder fights than trying to plant those telegraph poles on the Dunphy property. The court gave him permission to do so but that was the easy end of the battle. The hard part was to serve the papers on the stoutly barricaded and well defended Dunphy domicile. The servants had the strictest kind of orders to refuse everything that looked like "papers" and to see that no stranger gained admission to the house, even in the guise of a peddler, book agent, telephone repairer or policeman. So when the court messenger airily drove up to the place he was easily shoved off by a vigilant maid servant. The Prince's henchmen quickly realized the character of the work cut out for them and they resorted to the usual guile deemed necessary by the legal fraternity in such instances.

How the Dunphy Household was Flanked

A runaway accident was rehearsed with a horse that was guaranteed not to kill anybody and a buggy that was fixed to give a theatrical crash in front of the Dunphy residence. All the leading lady had to do was to look terrified and faint with a shriek just as the buggy got in its crash on the spot where the outburst would attract the attention of some one in the Dunphy household. At the proper time the foxy judgment-server, accompanied by the leading lady drove along the road and cut loose, as per rehearsal. There was the proper shout, shriek and crash as he deftly turned his panting steed into the Dunphy fence and adroitly stopped the headlong flight at the exact spot calculated. Several of the curious Dunphy servants ran out to see what all the din was about. They found a fainting woman in a buggy and an excited man trying his mightiest to pacify a frightened horse. When they came out to render assistance—they were assisted to the service of the papers.

Highly Sensational Finish

But the tricky server did not escape scot free. A vigilant woman, screened behind the blinds of one of the upper windows, fired hot shot at him as long as he was in sight. As for the leading lady, she thought it prudent to remain in her dead faint so as not to draw any of the fire of the servants who were free in their remarks about such contemptible actions. Mrs. Dunphy boarded the first train to San Francisco to consult her lawyer. While she was gone the wily Prince ordered his minions to Milbrae and by the time the Dunphys were back, primed with legal advice and action, the vicious-looking telephone poles were all in place.

Maxine Elliott to Star Alone

The rumor that is floating about that Maxine Elliott and Nat Goodwin are going to separate is evidently based on the fact that the two are going to appear as separate stars in the near future. They have been considering such a course for some time and have their plans to that effect clearly defined. Goodwin offers the following explanations in a letter to a friend here: "We have had such difficulty in finding plays in which we can both have suitable parts that we have come to the conclusion to take the next best thing, and that is to appear with separate companies. We are now considering a play for Miss Elliott which has no part for me. If we should decide to accept it she will appear next season as a star under my management. If the play proves unavailable we shall probably continue another season in our oldtime successes."

And Madame Eames Never said a Word to Us

When Madame Emma Eames was in town the smart set behaved its prettiest to the diva. They dined her as often as she would submit; her rooms were kept fragrant with the choicest blooms and on her nights the stage was always embroidered deep with floral tributes. And now Madame Eames goes to Philadelphia and an unlucky boniface assigned her a suite of rooms reminiscent of the last occupant's fondness for "the weed": tobacco odor hung in every cranny. The singer rushed from the room. She cried for help and was given an apartment just deserted by a W. C. T. U. anti-tobaccoite. But the harm had been done for while some fastidious persons would have sniffed nothing wrong in the first suite, your real high-priced prima donna's throat is a more sensitive concern and Madame Eames could not portray the chocolate-colored "Aida" of creamy voice for the Quaker City. Madame Eames afterward acknowledged that the odor of some flowers had a similar effect on her voice. She declared that unless she sent to her prospective hostesses the request "No flowers!" her drawing room appearances were funereal as far as she was personally concerned. "The dear San Francisco people," said Eames, "were so generous with their flowers and I hated to tell them the harmful effect flowers have on my voice. I was half glad to leave there on that account and deodorize myself of floral perfume." Perhaps those who strewed Eames' path with flowers while she was here are half sorry that the lady was too considerate to air her prejudices. Harry Holbrook and several others would be in pocket had they guessed her dislikes.

Blue Blood in "Trade"

Lady Gladys Herbert Grey, wife of Earl Grey, has just arrived in New York and the ton will lionize her. It has always been supposed that Mrs. Salisbury takes her cues from Lady Grey. The titled Englishwoman has long been a striking figure in English society and is voted by many the handsomest matron in the aristocracy. But Lady Grey is poor, which is hard for flesh and blue blood to bear. So she boldly opened a fashionable tea room in London which is very successful and through which she says she hopes to pay some of her debts. This going into "trade" has not cost her the warm personal friendship of Queen Alexandra which Lady Grey has always enjoyed. There are some members of our snobocracy who have not so kindly regarded Mrs. Salisbury's waffle venture, but perhaps the unshaken prestige of Lady Grey will show them that we are not unique in the possession of a society leader who has to scratch for luxuries. Lady Grey's daughter, Lady Sibyl, who is with her mother, is counted a beauty by English standards and should a rich American fancy her, 'tis said Lady Grey will not be ungracious. A son-in-law with a handsome dot would enable Lady Grey to retire from the restaurant business. Perhaps Mrs. Salisbury will solve the distasteful boarding-house problem in the same manner.

Outwitting the "Cave Dwellers"

Dr. and Mr. Clinton Cushing recently gave a tea in Washington that poised them forever in the exclusive set of that city. They went to the capital—or rather Mrs. Cushing went, for the doctor and she do their duty to each other by living three thousand miles apart—four years ago, and bought the old house once owned and occupied by Mr. McClean, former Minister to France. At the tea given last month Mrs. Cushing's social status was fixed by the fact that the Countess of Esterhazy poured tea for her. Hereafter Mrs. Cushing is "it." Washington society is peculiar and the way to conquer it is not even by being a millionaire Senator or Cabinet officer. Wives of both have failed to be recognized by the old Washington set known as "the cave-dwellers." There is just one set in Washington greater than these, and it is the diplomatic corps. Mrs. Cushing speaks the modern languages with more or less fluency and so she won the diplomatic corps, assisted of course by her pleasing and eccentric personality.

Camilla Urso's Pathetic End

With the passing of Camilla Urso the world lost one of the greatest woman artists of the past fifty years; a violinist who was placed in the ranks with Lady Halle, Joachim and almost with Ysaye. Her end was pathetic. Two months ago in the opera house of the little Ontario town she ran her bow across the strings and was surprised to find she could not strike the chord. Again she tried and saw her fingers refuse to stretch the distance required. The woman's heart beat in trepidation and the violin wailed in her hands. The despairing music started a child to crying in its mother's arms. The great violinist drifted into an improvisation and poured out her despair in music while the tears trickled from her eyes. The audience became very much affected: none of them guessed the great change that had come so suddenly over the life of the player. She cried all night long at the hotel where she was staying. The ashes of shattered ambition and of dead hopes were all about her. Next day friends got a hint of the truth and did their best to cheer her. They spoke of doctors and operations and rest as if health and hope were only matters of a brief time. But Camilla Urso knew better: with incomparable resignation, though, she went to the hospital and to her death.

A Don's Descendant in Court

That patriarch of the early Spaniards here, good old Governor Arguello, buried in the picturesque old church yard in the Mission, must have groaned at the tidings that a scion of his illustrious house was mixed up in a commonplace abduction case. The Arguello name is woven into the early annals of California with that of the Vallejos, Del Valles, De la Guerras and Pachecos. It crops up in stories and legends of the days antedating the Gringoes. And last week an Arguello, a lineal descendant of the Spanish Governor of California, was arrested for trying to abduct a child by his first marriage while the little one was on her way to school. The McKees, the child's maternal relatives, had Arguello and his second wife arrested. Mrs. Arguello No. 1 did not make a good impression in court, however, and the case went against her. The child said she went willingly and that her father telephoned her mother of the "seizure," saying as soon as he bought her some new clothes she could return to the McKees.

His Romantic Marriage

The short life of Louis Arguello has been peppered with strange doings. He might have been something altogether different but for the lack of training in his youth. His parents died when he was scarcely out of swaddling clothes and the relative who assumed his guardianship did not perform his duty according to the Scriptures. Louis fell in love with Clara McKee, the daughter of a Mission resident, and as soon as the law permitted he married her. When of age he came into a fortune of seventy-five thousand dollars, bought a house and furnished it for his bride. He covered her with jewels where she had not been used to brass buttons, spent his money on her family, also, and they improved their place until it became one of the finest in the Mission. They all lived at a rattling rate and enjoyed everything.

Mysterious Death Notices

Naturally, money spent at that rate could not last forever. I am not sure whether the property was in Mrs. Arguello's name or not; at any rate, the young husband came home one day to find the house sold, furniture gone and wife and child likewise. Rumor said one of Arguello's friends assisted in the flight, but whether or not this was so, the remains of the seventy-five thousand dollars had disappeared. Louis followed his wife East. Soon the report came back that he had committed suicide in Chicago under another name. The rumor was never contradicted, but Arguello did not die. Neither did he become reconciled to his wife. Eventually he returned here and began the study of medicine. One Sunday morning there was a notice in a local paper of his death—"Notice of funeral hereafter." His family had never approved his marriage and its outcome had completed the estrangement, but they were much concerned at his death—his second demise, as it were. Each relative thought the other must know how, when and where it had occurred, but no one did. Finally a friend of his turned up who said he had talked to Louis since the notice had appeared. Arguello, however, when he appeared, never gave any explanation. Subsequently the marriage of Mrs. Louis Arguello was announced without any especial reason; it likewise was left uncontradicted. But all these happenings with the so-called "abduction" as "the latest" have caused the Arguellos and the McKees to exclaim, "What next?"

Judge (to footpad): What excuse can you possibly have for your crime? You were caught red handed robbing this man and yet you had over twenty dollars in your pocket.

Prisoner: Well, Judge, you see the last time I was up I was warned to be more industrious and not such a spendthrift and that's just what I was doing.

Fred Greenwood's Quest

Society just at present is wandering and I notice that faithful Fred Greenwood is booked for the Orient. He softly denies that he is going as far as Japan but the wise ones know better. He will never leave the steamer until he reaches there, and I don't blame him. Faint heart never won fair lady, and if under the balmy Japanese skies Katherine does not look kindly upon her wooer I shall be very much surprised. Where is there a woman who can resist a man who has traveled several thousand miles for her sweet sake? Mr.

They Rarely Speak in Passing

Mrs. Ogden Mills is supposed to make or mar one socially in New York; consequently I scanned very closely the names of those bidden to her ball. I failed to discover that Mrs. Oelrichs, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont and their followers had been invited. This only confirmed what I have often heard before, that the Oelrichs-Belmont clique and Mrs. Mills scarcely speak in passing. Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt was present as was Mrs. Alexander, who really goes everywhere. Mrs. Alexander has the distinction, among society people, of being "the only nice Crocker." Even Colonel Fred, the head of the house, used to talk about "perfectly elegant society," and he never got used to his greatness. Mrs. Vanderbilt Jr. was present at the reception given by the Seward Webbs to the Chauncey Depews, but Mrs. Oelrichs was absent. The Vanderbilt name carries Birdie everywhere.

Society will Celebrate Mi-Careme

Society will not forget to take advantage of the twenty-four hours of grace alloted in Mid-Lent. In European countries, especially Catholic ones, Mi-Careme is celebrated with much-ado, usually taking the form of a carnival dance with the usual appendages —confetti-throwing and what not. There will of course be no hold-over carnival spirit left in us as the Mardi Gras soaks up the driblets that we are capable of giving. But Mi-Careme will be enjoyed if not in Continental fashion. Several smart dinners are promised for the older set and there will surely be a big dance for the light-footed contingent. The Sprecke's' have about decided to give the dance for their wing of society. The two largest rooms in the new Spreckels mansion are still in the hands of the decorators so they have not yet been able to test the capacity of the house, but as the first dancing party there proved, there is plenty of room as it is, for a "small and late." So Mi-Careme will probably find a merry party at the Spreckels' home. Most of our Lenten maids translate "sackcloth and ashes" as gray crepe de Paris and poudre de riz and they manage to keep on pretty good terms with "the world, the flesh and the devil"; but nevertheless Lent is necessarily "s'ow" and the girls will make the most of Mi-Careme.

What They Wore at the Game

Black is decidedly in favor for smart costumes, judging by the gowns worn at last Saturday's Eder Jai game. Georgie Hopkins and her cousin Frances wore black corduroy. Daisy Van Ness wore an eel-fitting black cloth. Therese Morgan's suit was of some rough black material with white embroidered embellishments. Alice Hager was in black velvet. Mrs. Fred Tallant wore black cloth with a white and black feather boa. Mrs. George Lent was in black cloth. Many Persian lamb jackets were worn and these seem rather preferred this year to sealskins. To vary the black monotone, Mrs. Gus Taylor wore a tan coat. Pearl Landers' suit was navy-blue cloth and Mrs. George Boyd wore a tan cloth. Mrs. Joe Tobin looked especially stunning in a corduroy suit whose shade blended harmoniously with her mink boa and muff. Miss Spreckels' dark red cloth was very becoming. Jennie Blair wore her favorite brown, with black Persian lamb jacket. Her hat was a Frenchy little affair with a big bunch of pink baby-roses in front and another peeping from beneath the brim.

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye

London society is gravely reported to be "somewhat start'ed" over the rumor that the King is on the verge of setting the fashion that "henceforth the proper thing is to be a devoted and faithful husband." No wonder the papers there take the Mrs. George Keppel incidents so seriously.

Met Her Swinging on the Front Gate

Friends of Dottie Ames and Sam Pond are pointing to them as present-day examples of the faithful lovers of our fairy books. Mr. Pond has been in love with Miss Ames ever since the day, years ago, he saw her hanging over her father's front gate at Santa Rosa. Dottie Ames is a niece of the Barclay Henleys and on her frequent visits to San Francisco the ex-Mayor's son was always very attentive. With the Klondike rush,

Found a Fortune in the Big Canal

Contractors will have chances to make millions out of the Isthmian canal, according to Engineer Raoul Dutard, who has just returned from making a careful study of both routes. He thinks the American contractors will have by far the best chance at these millions because it was the American contractors who made by far the greatest clean-up in the old Panama days. The Slavin brothers of this city led the contractors of all nations in that race. They kept a drug store in Market street but the ownership in a newfangled dredger, that fairly ate up the earth before it, got them interested in Panama contracts and it wasn't long before they dropped their drug store and devoted themselves wholly to the new enterprise. As work progressed and they saw what golden opportunities lay before them they went East, got big capital into their schemes, floated powerful companies, and when the Panama company went to pieces they were millionaires many times over. Their remarkable good fortune was always attributed to the giant service of their dredgers, but according to Engineer Dutard, their success was in a great measure due to the careful way in which they housed and worked their men in that fever infested land. Dutard, who was under French contractors, says their camps were simply slaughterhouses; the men were worked on improper food and drink, and under the grossest sanitary conditions, and they died like flies. Wages went on while the sick were gasping in the hospitals, no money could be collected on the uncompleted contracts and bankruptcy cleaned out the Frenchmen.

Secret of His Success

The successful Americans attacked the enterprise altogether differently. Before Henry B. Slavin entered into any Panama contracts he made a careful study of the situation down there and figured out what he would have to do to keep his men in prime health and in daily working condition. He began by establishing medical and sanitary departments, cooking camps and sleeping and living quarters on military principles. He had a hospital and hospital ships as good as any the Red Cross society ever provided. He employed the best cooks money could lure to that blazing region and he had prime provisions regularly shipped to his camps from the United States. He didn't stop there but kept up this good work by having a regular sanitary corps who saw to it that the camps and their surroundings were maintained at the top notch. The Frenchmen thought Slavin was a lunatic to spend so much money in caring for his men. Of course it cost him a mint of money but he barreled half a dozen mints by this system. For instance, one of his contracts of several hundred thousand dollars yielded 120 per cent in a year. Indeed, his companies cleaned up so much that the Frenchmen used to say that all the money spent on the canal by the Panama company went into the United States. The Slavin brothers and their backers, Eugene Kelly, Bliss of Bliss, Morton & Co., and J. J. Phelan, got most of it.

Drowned Their Cares in Champagne

Warner Miller and a number of other big Eastern capitalists were hypnotized by the fortunes made by this coterie and they plunged heavily in the Nicaragua canal scheme. Some of the American stockholders in dredging and contracting companies, who had made money out of the Panama project, thought it was another golden chance and they transferred their interests in dredgers, machinery and the like to the new company. Then came the assessment and shortly afterwards everything was swallowed up. Both isthmian companies are in a bankrupt condition, unable to go ahead. That's why they are so anxious to sell out to the United States. Whichever route is now selected, this government will throw millions of dollars into pushing the work to completion and it is in the spending of these millions that the golden days of the contractors will come again, as it did with the Slavins. The Panama company spent four hundred millions in digging the incompleted ditch it is now willing to sell this government for forty millions. Most of it was spent like water. Mansions were built along the route of the canal for the directing officers to live in and princely salaries were paid them. Every effort was made on the part of the company to surround them with luxuries so they would forget la belle France for the time and be content to dwell in that blazing and fever infected climate. Champagne flowed like water and in the flood men tried to blind themselves to their surroundings. The voluptuous living along the line rivaled anything of its kind in the world. In a measure it accounted for the great death rate there. It used to be a trite saying along the canal that every foot of ground dug cost a man's life.

Mrs. Lovell White's Resignation

The first bombshell has exploded in the "color line" conflict in the California club in the resignation of Mrs. Lovell White from the presidency. That more explosions will come nobody doubts who has watched the vehement feelings and animosities engendered by the discussion. Mrs. White has worked indomitably for the club's welfare ever since she started it. Her best energies were exercised in trying to stave off the discussion of the question which threatens so much irreparable injury to the organization. But numbers of other influential members were stoutly determined to have it emphatically settled their own way. In consequence the last meetings have been slumbering tempests. Charges have been made and insinuations passed which I am sure the speakers will deeply regret when their vehemence has cooled.

The Great Fight in the California Club

The warmest meeting in the history of the California club was held last Tuesday in the terrific battle over the "color line." After a fashion good feeling was manifested on both sides, but—well, as one of the eagle-plumed champions subsequently tartly remarked, "Sweet smiles over the tea-cups won't settle this matter." Although some members knew that the question was to come up on January twenty-first, the club at large received no notification to that effect, and that was the beginning of the charges and trouble. The clever politicians on the colored sisters' side sent postals to their friends, and, as the conservatives declare, packed the meeting and forced the question to an issue. Could coarse men stand charged with coarser work? Members who never attend meetings were dug up for the occasion. By this means the vote was carried by about sixty to twenty. Thereupon rose cries of "Fraud," "Packed meeting," and the like. The vanquished declared they would bring the whole matter up again. So Mrs. E. L. Campbell, Mrs. J. H. Jewett and Mrs. James Denman issued a postal notice to every member of the club that at the meeting of the twenty-eighth one of them would move to rescind the action taken at the last meeting. So the fight was on with renewed vehemence.

Storm Centre of the Battle

Mrs. Lovell White, as chairman, may not be up to all the parliamentry tricks of the battle-scarred veterans and the war-horses of a dozen fraternal and woman-suffrage campaigns, but she is a lady. Apparently, the color line erasers were desperately "afraid of some trick." They kept telling each other "to watch out," to be prepared to challenge the vote, on the score of non-payment of dues, or neglect to sign the constitution. There was a great digging-up of dollars and penning of autographs. The secretary's dask became a veritable storm-centre. Mrs. Campbell, "the parliamentarian" of the club, persisted in making a daisy little speech, in which she discussed the subject before she had made her motion. For this course she was promptly called to order by cries of "Motion, motion." At last she delivered herself of her motion, and an attempt was promptly made to table the whole discussion. Eyes flashed and "things were said" and the hardest kind of a struggle followed to prevent a vote being taken. But the house was determined.

Hot Shot and Hard Feeling

Another contest developed over the time-keeper for speakers. Mrs. Sharon was chosen. Instantly there was a cry for a second time-keeper. When calls were made for Mrs. C. Mason Kinne, she refused, preferring to reserve her strength for the floor. She was terribly in earnest and was ready to fight the war all over again. It is to her that the club was indebted for the first real taste of exciting debate. At the very beginning she interrupted President White in the midst of a ruling to assure her "that we don't want the methods of a fourth ward politician brought into the California club." Mrs. White smiled her sweetest smile even in the face of this shot. What could be more delicious than her little speech before she announced the result of the ballot: "Ladies, after you know the result, I hope the victors will bear their victory with proper humbleness of spirit and try to endure the vanquished." And in this wise the color line was wiped out in the club, but—Mrs. Lovell White has resigned from the presidency, numbers of other influential members are looking daggers at each other and the battle will be resumed next Tuesday before the State Federation of Women's Clubs. The excitement isn't over by any means, and the "color line" still hangs high in the air.

A Malady for Croesuses Only

A certain medico of Napa, who is known for his skill and his charity, was asked recently to go to a town in the upper end of the valley to attend a young man, believed to be a victim of appendicitis.

"I'll go up on the next train," promised the doctor, "but tell me, has this patient any money?"

"No, doctor," said his friend, "I wish you'd be as light on him as possible."

"Well," replied the physician, "if he hasn't money he can't have appendicitis."

She Writes Sunday School Books

Mrs. Isabel McDonald Alden is visiting in Los Angeles and is being feted by the women's clubs there and the religious societies. Mrs. Alden is from Boston and is best known in the literary world as "Pansy." Her books had a great vogue a few years ago among the churches and even now no Sunday-school library is considered complete without a set of them. Though they lay no claims to literary merit they are readable and have netted their author quite a tidy fortune, and have also swelled the receipts of their publisher, the D. Lothrop company. "Pansy's" muse is as prolific as that of Miss Braddon.

"I never gossip," confided Miss Telltale.

"What, never?" demanded her surprised friend.

"Never; whenever I want to hear my neighbors discussed I mention a name and simply listen to the remarks."

Who Owns the Wedding Presents?

What threatened to develop into a very serious difference between a well known young insurance man and his newly wedded wife has just been happily nipped in the bud by a sympathetic friend—oddly enough an attorney. Among the marriage presents was a beautiful silver chafing-dish outfit. Early in the honeymoon the young wife contracted the chafing-dish mania. The husband, however, enjoys a wholesome appetite that refuses to be restricted to the chafing-dish range of appetizers. He patiently controlled his gnawings for a time but as her fad showed no signs of waning, he began to protest and at last put his foot down—on the chafing-dish, figuratively speaking. This manner of objecting seemed unavailing, so one day when his wife was out he cleverly injured the chafing-dish so that it could never be used again. But the wife was clever in her own way. When she discovered what had been done she jestingly charged him with breaking the dish on purpose.

He Fell Into the Trap

Unthinkingly, he laughed and confessed that he had. The feelings of the wife promptly changed; she brust into tears and declared he was akin to a brute for destroying her wedding presents to glut his ill humor. The husband began to fire up under such charges and insisted that the dish was his own particular private property, as were all the wedding presents. The hot dispute that followed left the Sampson-Schley controversy deep in the ice-box. In all likelihood a divorce court in full swing would have been called on to settle the point had not the friend of the couple, an attorney, happened in. At once the case was dinned in his ears: to whom did the wedding presents belong, especially the chafing-dish? He was stumped for a moment but after going over the evidence he discovered that the chafing-dish had been addressed to the wife as a wedding present. She called him a Solomon, and turning to her crestfallen spouse she exclaimed: "There, didn't I tell you so?" The attorney seized the happy moment to read the young couple a sound lecture on marriage, divorce and alimony. Under the law, as he found it, if one sends a present to a person about to be married the gift belongs exclusively to the man or woman to whom it is intended and not necessarily to both of the contracting couple. Convention requires that the gift be sent to the bride's home and for the sake of delicacy no distinction is made between the bride or groom, but nevertheless the title to the gift rests in the person named by the sender. This information may save misunderstandings in some households.

"That actress has a queer idea of herself."

"Why?"

"She seems to think the more the audience sees of her the better they'll like her."

St. Dunstan's Not for Bachelors Only

There were evidently not enough well-to-do bachelors in San Francisco to fill St. Dunstan's, otherwise I cannot account for the fact that the fair sex has been admitted within the precincts of the apartment house originally designed "for gentlemen only." A few weeks ago I ran over a list of local bachelors who "keep house." The list was short and will probably diminish more this year, as I hear rumors that one or two of the house-keeping bachelors are seriously pondering matrimony. Anyhow, St. Dunstan's is not to be wholly inhabited by bachelors. Some of the apartments have been engaged by young married people who have grown tired of housekeeping on a large scale and prefer to live as so many smart people do in New York, with all the comforts of home about them and none of the disadvantages of a storied house or independent flat. As there is to be a cafe attached to St. Dunstan's, under Mr. John Tait's supervision, "keeping house" there will be an easy task. The Burns McDonalds were among the first to apply for apartments in St. Dunstan's under the new rule and they expect to be settled by the middle of Lent.

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

His Study in Red

Preston Haynes took great credit to himself for having "discovered" the Glaston carriage house. The upper story certainly made an ideal studio, being large, sunny, and exquisitely finished in natural woods. It had been a nine days' wonder when old Glaston built it, but right after that the crash came, and never had the presence of a horse or even a carriage profaned it. Glaston blew out his brains, and his widow was reduced to the usual expedient of keeping boarders. She was a little faded woman with a hopeless expression of countenance, as though she had nothing more to expect from life. She lived like a nun, seeing nobody but her boarders and going nowhere but to make her daily purchases. There had been a Miss Gaston, the possessor of a Voice and Aspirations. Being a modern young woman with a will of her own she had found her way to New York and finally to Europe for purposes of study. The great world seemed to have swallowed her up.

Preston Haynes fitted up his quarters luxuriously, installing his art treasures collected abroad and what he chose to keep of his mother's belongings. He was the envy of all his acquaintances. The stable had a separate entrance on a narrow avenue, and being intended for occupancy by a coachman contained a complete suite of cosy little rooms. The view from the windows was unsurpassed: in one direction the Bay, its islands and Tamalpais; in the other directions the streets and dwellings of the busy city. The Jap from the big house kept his rooms in order, and Mrs. Glaston, in overlooking household affairs, flitted in and out like a gray ghost.

Haynes was working on a picture for the spring exhibition. It was a danseuse, all in red against a red background and holding a magnificent red rose. Withal, she had a veritable crown of red hair. As the face of the danseuse began to take distinct shape on the canvas the landlady began to show an interest in the work till at last she watched it narrowly as though fascinated. Haynes felt this to be a tribute to his art and made a remark to that effect.

"It reminds me of some one I used to know," said she, simply.

One day she found him studying a collection of photographs and sketches. She saw at once that they represented the original of the painting. The beautiful bold girl was represented in every possible pose and costume, or, more properly speaking, lack of costume. The landlady examined the photographs slowly, deliberately.

"These are all the same person?" said she, at length.

"Yes, the original of my picture."

"Who was she—an actress?"

"A singer in a cafe chantant, a model, everything, anything."

"You knew her?"

"Well, rather. We were good friends in the old days before she got her duke and her diamonds."

"Then she was not—not—a good—woman?"

"My dear Mrs. Glaston, what would you have? She had her good qualities. All the virtues are not comprised in one, you know. At all events, she has 'arrived,' as I said a moment ago."

Day after day, as the painting progressed, the landlady came in, and plied Haynes with questions about "La Belle Rhoda." She listened hungrily, never having enough of anecdote and description. Haynes rambled on, gathering inspiration from these chats, and fancying that his painting was all the better for them. He chuckled to himself with amusement, regarding it all as an old woman's curiosity about affairs out of her world.

At last the painting was finished. That day Mrs. Glaston came in with a bundle of photographs and bade him look at them. One was a little girl in dancing school dress—short skirts, light shoes and stockings, and bare, thin arms. The others were the same girl grown up, showing her in various costumes and poses. She was a beautiful, bold woman with a crown of thick, mutinous hair—the woman of his painting.

"My God," exclaimed the artist, "who is this? How did you come by these?"

"This was my daughter."

"Why—why didn't you—oh, if I had known, if I had supposed for a moment—"

"But you could not suppose. And I wanted to know—all—"

She turned and went away. Next day she did not appear. A little later the Japanese servant came in and told him that his mistress had been found dead in her bed with the gas turned on. An accident, of course.

COULDN'T FILL THE—PARTS

The Princess of the pantomime
  Was very sad at heart,
For while the others talked, she had Almost a thinking part.

Said she to the Stage-Manager:
  "I think it's horrid mean
The Prince has almost all the 'fat'
  And I have all the lean.

"She is quite plain, and cannot act,
  It needs but half a glance
To see that I am better far
  Both in the song and dance."

"You should be Prince, of course," he said,
  "If merit got its rights,
But though you well could fill her part
  You could not fill her tights!"

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION.

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought, or other fads. Instruction private, not classes.

We solicit investigation.

To a Victim of Gossip

Let the ancient tabbies spit,
Belle Marie;
Writhing in a righteous fit,
Belle Marie;
Arch their backs and show their claws,
In your beauty find a cause—
Peacock never pleased the daws,
Belle Marie.

You're our own Parisienne,
Belle Marie;
If you flirt a bit—what then?
Belle Marie?
Shall the sun refuse to shine?
Shall we drink sour grapes or wine?
Take their withered smiles for thine,
Belle Marie?

You've a weapon in your eyes,
Belle Marie;
Sharper than their venomed lies,
Belle Marie;
They may aim their idle darts,
Far above their feline arts,
You're the mistress of our hearts,
Belle Marie. —C. W.

FAIRIES WILL REVEL.

Next Saturday will be opened the fairy carnival at the Mechanic's Pavilion, for which Manager Buckley has been diligently working during the past two months. Not since the famous Authors' Carnival will the Pavilion have been the scene of such a picturesque and artistic affair. Bothwell Brown has drilled his little dancers until they are perfect in the charming evolutions of the fairy ballet. The grand march will be a beautiful sight. On the opening night "He is a Native Son," a clever musical production, will be presented and there will be tableaux and other numbers. Arrangements have been made for different evenings to be given over to societies and organizations, the members of which will be admitted as the guests of the management on those nights. The carnival will be open daily (Sunday excepted), from one to eleven o'clock p. m. There will be refreshment stands of all sorts in the building, and everything possible will be provided for the comfort of the visitors.

A CHANCE FOR COLLECTORS.

This is the time of year when the knowing dilettante goes to work to improve his collection of articles of vertu and objets d'art. It is all very well for the wealthy householder who never misses the price of an expensive painting, statue or vase to buy when it suits his fancy. But the man or woman with less well-filled pocket-books waits for the annual clearance sale at a standard art store, and then hastens to browse among the shelves of bric-a-brac and to unearth the priceless gems of art that are "marked down." The connoisseur is reveling just now in the annual clearance sale at Gump's, 113-115 Geary street. Next week will probably mark the close of this sale, for art lovers are taking brisk advantage of the cut in prices on the Gump art treasures. All the goods are being sold at twenty per cent discount. The lover of fine porcelain stands in rapture before the array of dainty cups and saucers, dinner and tea sets that are included in the clearance sale. The porcelains at Gump's are of very uncommon makes and shapes. The discount extends to the glassware and to the art goods' department upstairs, where the pictures, lamps, fancy stands and pedestals, with exquisite table and mantel ornaments and clocks, are all included in the annual clearance sale.

THE RACES.

The interest taken in the winter meeting of the California Jockey Club this season exceeds all expectations of the management. Every day there is a large crowd at the Oakland track and on Saturdays the attendance is especially good. Today a fine card has been arranged, every event being interesting. The horses entered include most of the favorites of Californian and Eastern ownership.

A PERFECT BRAND.

If you would feel real frisky,
And change sad heart to gay,
Drink this one brand of whisky—
The Argonaut "O. K."

E. Martin & Co., proprietors, 54-56 First street.

There's a new way to give theatrical stars prominence. They have had cigars and racers named after them, and now Mrs. Fiske has had an oil "gusher" christened "Becky Sharp" in her honor. Becky is now on the Oil Exchange.

Miss Roberts in New Plays

Miss Florence Roberts, who opens her fifth annual season at the Alcazar in June, returned from New York last week bringing with her some very strong plays, which she will produce during her season. After "Zaza," which will be the feature of her season, the strongest play among them will be "Drusa Wayne" by Franklin Fyles. It is a powerful drama and had it been written for Miss Roberts could not be better suited to her great emotional powers. Miss Roberts promises an exceptional production of it. A strong play by the late Steele McKaye, a new one by Charlotte Thompson and one by another Californian writer will also be produced by Miss Roberts during her stay at the Alcazar. The advance both financially and artistically in Miss Roberts' seasons each year shows a marked increase in her popularity. She has a select and large following and draws an entirely different class of people during her season than attend the theatre in the winter seasons. She will as usual bring special support and some very handsome gowns, and quite the best season yet is expected for her.

Better than the Orignal Production

"The Ameer" made a much more emphatic hit at the Tivoli on Monday night than when Frank Daniels produced it at the Columbia. The swing of the music is brought out by Director Steindorff's men with fine effect and Ferris Hartman's quips and pranks speedily put the audience into good humor with itself and the opera. "The Ameer" is not one-half so good as "The Wizard of the Nile," nor one-quarter so good as "The Idol's Eye," but it is good for a solid run at the Tivoli with the strong cast at present presenting it. Harold Gordon, Frances Graham and Anna Lichter were all accorded a round of applause on their entrance Monday night, long-sustained hand-clappings welcoming the returned feminine pilgrims. Each of the three had a chance to earn an enthusiastic encore when the solos were apportioned, and bouquets were thrown over the footlights to them all. The choruses are finely sung, with spirit and understanding. The opera is staged with splendor and the costumes are handsome.

A Strong Organization

Even in the palmiest days of the Tivoli I can remember no season when the company was stronger, musically considered, than it is now. The principals not only can sing and act but they possess voices. Anna Lichter's soprano is of fine quality and though her work in "The Ameer" is not showing her at her best, she will be in perfect form by the time "The Serenade" and the Alice Neilsen operas are produced. Frances Graham, also, is not shown at her best in the Daniels opera which, having been written for a comedian star, is weak in the other roles. But Miss Graham will have her chance later on. In "The Serenade" she will have several strong numbers that will give opportunity to that soft, velvety contralto. Miss Lichter's spirituelle type and the more voluptuous beauty of Miss Graham are in artistic contrast and it is seldom one finds a leading soprano and contralto that balance so well. I cannot recall when the company has had such a tenor as Harold Gordon. If our climate agrees with his voice, he promises to become an acquisition that the management will do well to retain through more than one season. His tenor is singularly pure. He does not, however, handle it so well as he might if he had a better method. His intonation is throaty and only in the upper register does he manage to show of what rich timbre his organ is built. Arthur Cunningham has one of the most valuable voices in the company. His is a strong baritone under admirable control. Annie Myers, too, has a voice of remarkable value, a sweet and well trained mezzo soprano. With Ferris Hartman at the head of the trio of clever comedians—Harry Cashman and Edward Webb being the others—surely this is a splendid aggregation. The chorus contains many singers of both sexes that are capable of creditably assuming speaking roles on short notice. The array of operas underlined to follow "The Ameer" is interesting—first, the melodious "Serenade," then "The Singing Girl," and "The Fortune Teller"; the first is now in preparation. I should be glad to see a revival of "Bluff King Hal" during the engagement of these good singers. How beautifully would the voices of Anna Lichter and Harold Gordon blend in that exquisite love duet, and how cleverly would Ferris Hartman and Miss Graham act the roles of Mistress Dorothy and the High Constable. I should also like to see during the season Giacomo Minkowsky's "The Smugglers of Badayez" and Clay Greene's "Maid of Plymouth." But one ought not to ask too much. "The Serenade" ought to be enough.

A Titled Amateur

The Marquis of Annesley says his jewels are paste. These jewels were the ones that created such a sensation in the production of "Aladdin" by amateurs at Lord Anglesey's place in Wales, Plas Newydd, during the last week of the old year. Fully ten thousand dollars were spent upon the costumes and magnificent jewels were worn. Lord Anglesey is passionately fond of jewels and his attire is always enriched by price less gems. He owns as many as an Indian Prince. In the private theatricals at his place in one scene he wore a coat encrusted with diamonds, rubies, sapphires and emeralds, embroidered in an elaborate and complicated design. However, these are the jewels that the titled amateur says were nothing but paste.

Good Vaudeville Turns

Every wheelman in town should see the "cycle whirl" at the Orpheum this week. It is the most sensational act on wheels that has been seen here. Gus Seyfried and F. W Sheelor are the riders and their turn fully fulfills the description on the bill—"every known law of gravity defied." They cycle in an inclined and enclosed circle. There is nothing of the trick rider in their act; all is legitimate. But there are times when one's eyes can scarcely follow the wheelsmen, so swiftly they fly around the circle. It is a great act. Beside the cycle whirlers, the other star number on this week's bill is Josephine Sabel, whose charm never withers. Custom could never stale the infinite variety of Sabel, who holds a place equal to that of Lydia Yeamans Titus in the hearts of Orpheum audiences. Sabel wears her hair a new way, and she wears a long skirt with a waist cut several degrees higher than of yore, otherwise she has not changed. Her new songs are like her new frock in being less pronounced than the old. But her new version of "A Hot Time," given to satisfy insistent encores, is chicly original, as is her assortment of late slang terms. I always wonder that Paris ever lets Sabel leave her. She is as great a favorite abroad as she is here, which is saying a good deal. The junior member of Jordan & Crouch is agility itself. The little Japs, the Nambas, are clever. Kelly and Violette wear some stunning costumes.

A Modern Melodrama

Edwin Arden, the actor who, like Robert Drouet, dares to defy fate by writing plays, has composed a rattling good melodrama. He has gathered together all the best situations in standard melodramas and the result is "Zorah." In the first place this play, which has made such a hit at the Grand this week, has a splendid scenic environment. In the second place it has startling climaxes that, like the continued stories in the blood-and-thunder weeklies, always make one long for the next instalment. Given fine scenery and sensational climaxes and add to them a fervid dialogue and intense situations, what more could a melodrama want? Characters, of course, that combine all these qualities—picturesqueness, fervor, intensity—and these Mr. Arden has provided in the persecuted Jews and the American girl and man. The Governor, too, is a strong character. Mr. Arden is not well adapted to the Rabbi's role but as he wrote the play he may be forgiven for miscasting himself. Miss Hall as Zorah and Mr. Mayall as the Chicago broker do admirable work. Mr. and Mrs. Crane are welcome additions to the company, respectively playing the parts of the Governor and the American girl.

Attractions Next Week

"The Ameer" will run all next week at the Tivoli.

"Coralie & Co. Dressmakers," will be seen for the last time at the Alcazar tomorrow night. On Monday evening will be given Joaquin Miller's famous old Californian story which McKee Rankin helped him to arrange for the stage, "The Danites." The plot of the play, it will be recalled, centres around a society of Mormons who were banded together for the extermination of men and their families who had killed Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet. Realistic scenes of the pioneer days will add to the interest of the production, and the management intends to exert itself to do "The Danites" full justice.

"A Man of Mystery" will give place at the Central on Monday night to "Master and Man," a powerful melodrama that has not been seen here in years.

Marion Crawford's novel, "In the Palace of the King," is one of the most popular of his works, and introduces Don John and other historic characters. Lorimer Stoddard's dramatization of the novel is said to be remarkably good, not detracting in any way from its strength but rather adding to it. The play will be the Columbia's attraction next week, with Viola Allen in the character of Dolores. The prices for the engagement are two dollars, one dollar and a half, one dollar, seventy-five, fifty, and twenty-five cents. The Columbia announces as early attractions, "Way Down East," and Augustus Thomas' most succesful play, "Arizona."

Though "Zorah" has made such a hit at the Grand it will be withdrawn after tomorow night to make way for "Jim, the Penman." The latter is one of the most popular dramas ever written and never loses its drawing powers. Edwin Arden, who has established himself firmly in favor with the Grand Opera House's audiences, will be the title hero—or villain, what you will.

Adelina Roattino, prima donna, will lead the novelties on next week's Orpheum bill. Joseph Reichens and his hand balancing dogs, direct from Europe, will be new here. The Faust trio—Victor Jerome ("The Demon"), Lottie Fremont, the mechanical doll, and Harry N. Walsh, the diminutive comedian—will present "The Haunted Mill," abounding in surprises. Josephine Sabel, Kelly and Violette, Jordan and Crouch, the Da Comas and the great cycle whirl will all be on the program. Sabel has two new songs.

A POPULAR RESTAURANT'S REMOVAL

Since 1876 the Original Vienna Bakery, Cafe and Restaurant has been established at 205 Kearny street. For the last three years Mr. F. B. Galindo has been the manager, and under his management the Original Vienna increased in popularity, being liberally patronized to an extent that finally caused its removal to larger quarters. The new location of the Vienna Bakery is at 133-135 O'Farrell street, next to the Orpheum, which is both central and convenient. The same prices that made the Vienna at its old location so popular will prevail at the new cafe.

MUSIC

Josef Hofmann's Art

The big audience that filled the Columbia last Tuesday afternoon was at once conquered by the earnestness and simplicity of Josef Hofmann's art. The pianist, though he is twenty-four years of age now and no longer to be termed a phenomenon, appears still but a lad. There is nothing freakish about him. The same direct and sincere characteristics that mark Josef Hofmann the man are shown in the work of the pianist. He is absolutely without pretense. His appearance, with his short hair and pleasant, open countenance, is as devoid of affectation as his playing. His program included Haydn's F minor variations, Beethoven's Sonate Appassionata Schubert's Impromptu in G major and Soiree de Vienne, Chopin's ballade in A flat, Prelude No. 25 and valse in A flat, Liszt's Gnomenreigen, Schumann's Nachstucke, Moszkowski's Jongleur and the overture to "Tannhauser." His playing of all these varied themes and emotions was positive, intellectually valuable, clear and strong. The "Tannhauser" overture was waited for with interest, as this is considered one of the greatest things in Hofmann's repertory, and on a par with Rosenthal's great Schumann number. It was a masterly technical feat, and roused the audience to such a pitch of excitement that, though it was the concluding number, nobody would go until the applause had brought the pianist out again to bow, in his quiet, composed manner. He finally responded to the plaudits by seating himself at the piano and giving the most brilliant rendition ever heard here of the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire." This and the Liszt number were the most showy of his selections. The Chopin ballade was a poetic interpretation, and the Schumann "Nachstucke," though the audience failed to give it its due meed of applause, was a beautiful number. The more one hears a player like Hofmann the more one is sure to like him. I read his "Five Piano Lessons" in last Sunday's Chronicle, and found them of interest and value. Like their author's playing, they appeal directly to the understanding. There are no unnecessary words. He says what he has to say in few sentences, but none of these could be omitted. The second Hofmann recital occurred yesterday. On Thursday night Tuesday's program was repeated in Oakland. To satisfy the demand, two extra recitals will be given week after next in Metropolitan hall, one on Wednesday night, the twelfth, and one on Saturday afternoon, the fifteenth, the programs for which will be shortly announced.

The Symphony Season

The first concert of the second series of symphony concerts was given yesterday, too late for review this week. The third concert of the first series showed conclusively that the orchestra is going to do excellent work under Paul Steindorff's direction now that it is getting accustomed to his leadership. And the leader is warming to his work. He has found his bearings, so to speak, and is sure to forge ahead in a manner that augurs well for the permanency of our symphony orchestra. Walter Damrosch constantly reiterated that the musical life of our city would never amount to anything without a permanent symphony orchestra. Through the efforts of the San Francisco Symphony Society we seem about to gain such an orchestra. There are still some of our best musicians, members of the Bauer and other symphony orchestras, who have failed to enroll themselves within the present organization. But as it stands, it is a band of very earnest workers, all anxious to gain perfection by steady practice. Steindorff is very popular with his men and they recognize the concert master, Minetti, as one of themselves and a worthy second to the leader. If the second series of symphony concerts fulfills the hopes of the society, it will be encouraged to hold together for good and all. Those who fancy the Symphony Society is expecting to make money by the concerts are much mistaken. At the low prices of subscription and admission, even if the Grand Opera House were packed at every concert, there would be but a small surplus in the treasury. It is an artistic success that the society looks for, and its work is undertaken in the cause of musical culture.

The Nordica Concerts

The first Nordica recital, on Tuesday night, will be a society affair, of course. There will be three concerts next week, all in Metropolitan hall. Tuesday and Thursday nights and Saturday matinee are the dates of the recitals. I gave the program of the first recital last week; it will include "Voi Che Sapeti" from "The Marriage of Figaro," Brunhilde's Call from "Die Walkure," ballads by MacDowell, d'Hardelot, Grieg and others. At the second recital Elsa's Dream from "Lohengrin" will be sung and the aria from Erkel's "Laslos," also the polonaise from "Mignon." The song cycle by Von Fielitz, "Eliland," is on the third program, the Saturday matinee. Prices for the recitals range from one to three dollars. Mr. E. Romayne Simmons, pianist, will assist Madame Nordica at her recitals.

Bouvier and Greenbaum have several fine attractions to follow Nordica. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra in concerts is the first.

At the Von Meyerinck School

The Von Meyerinck School of Music will give a children's recital this afternoon in the recital hall of the school, when the following program will be presented: Piano duet, La Grace, Bohm, Alice Levy, assisted by Miss Nedda Blackaller; piano, By the Spring, Gurlett, By the Fireside, Chittenden, Lonely Rose, Hazel Sexton; songs, Rocking Baby, Neidlinger, Evening Star, Das Wandern, Schubert, Pearl Giles; piano, Little Waltz, Hunting song, Echment, Maud Curley; songs—Sik and Leven, King Cole, McCurrie, Our Flag, Neidlinger, Herbert von Meyerinck; piano, Evening Star, Chittenden, duet, March, Wessey Skillen; songs—Butterfly Page's song from McCurrie's "Rival Queens," In Winter, Nevin, Hardenroslei, Schubert, Hazel Sexton; club swinging, children's physical culture class, under direction of Mrs. McKay; piano duet, march, Herman Frank, Hazel Sexton and Herbert von Meyerinck; piano, Valse Serieuse, Fradel, Birthday Song, Rohde, Hunting Song, Spindler, H. von Meyerinck; recitation, Lucile Luise, The Hospital, Hazel Sexton; piano, Bitte, Emery, Alice Levy; piano, duet, Polka, Rohde, H. von Meyerinck, assisted by Madame von Meyerinck. On February thirteenth, a dramatic recital will be given with this program: Song of the Norns, Hofmann, by Class I and II; soli, Misses Maude Fay and Helen Heath; second act of "The Freischutz," Weber—Agathe, Miss Helen Heath, Aennchen, Miss Mae Cullen, Bridesmaid, Miss Craig, chorus by the dramatic class. On the nineteenth there will be a piano recital by the pupils, assisted by a vocal quartet and a solo violin.

Camilla Urso

Camilla Urso, who died last week, was very well known here, both among society and musical people. She was always much entertained when in San Francisco. On her last visit she appeared at the Orpheum, having taken her speaking violin into vaudeville. Madame Urso was an indefatigable worker. Every day she took an hour for slow and patient practice in making long-sustained notes. This was to obtain a strong and pure tone. Then she played scales and finger exercises for two more hours, and then such sonatas and other great works as she used in her concerts. In all this she never hurried, never gave any particular expression to her music, and seldom played it up to the full time in which the piece is written. Everything was played slowly, carefully and thoughtfully. When the long practice hours were over, and she came upon the stage to play, all thoughtful effort was abandoned, and her emotions controlled the music. The practicing was mere mental and technical work—the performance the blooming of a great genius in music.

New York City, STEINWAY HALL

A piano recital was given in Byron Mauzy hall last Friday evening by pupils of Miss Clara Nolan, assisted by Mr. Bautista Boronda, tenor. A program of twenty-three numbers was successfully rendered, the participants being Misses Clara Gorham, Lillian Olsen, Hazel Dodge, Helena Bredhoff, Pearl Vidy, Dorothy Farrell, Mary G. Fitzpatrick, Kathryn and May Powers, Kathryn Sullivan, Evelyn Kiley, Miriam Grace, Adele Coleman, Marguerite Gorham, Elvise Nolan, Grace Gleason, Ella and Martha Hoyt and Alice Dwyer, Master Raymond Nolan and Miss Clara Nolan. A large audience enjoyed the recital.

Madame Fabbri-Mueller's seventieth birthday was celebrated on Monday evening with a testimonial concert under the patronage of the leading musical people of the city. The program was contributed by Mrs. Birmingham, Miss Joseph, Madame de Seminario, Miss Samuels, Mrs. de Mott, Miss George, the Pasmore sisters, Messrs. Aspland, Barnhart, Pasmore, Hecht, Lewis and Fickenscher. All the prominent musicians and patrons of music were in attendance at the concert.

At the recent election of officers in the Music Teachers' Association of California the following were chosen to fill the positions for the ensuing year: President, H. W. Patrick; vice-president, A. Spadina; secretary, Mrs. J. A. Whiteside; treasurer, Mrs. P. O. Paterson. The directors elected were Joseph Greven, T. O. Herzog and Madame Ellen Coursen-Roeckel.

Dr. Stewart in Boston

The Churchman of New York in a recent issue pays a flattering tribute to the ability of Dr. H. J. Stewart as a composer of sacred music. Dr. Stewart's Christmas oratorio, "The Nativity" was performed in Trinity church, Boston, of which the composer is now organist and director, this being its initial performance in that city under his direction, though the Sunday before it had been performed in Park Congregational church. The oratorio was sung by the regular choir of the church assisted by Mrs. Follett, soprano, Mrs. Sawyer, contralto, Frederic Smith, tenor and Arthur Beresford, bass, Claud Fisher, violinist and Van Veachton Rogers, harpist. Dr. Stewart presided at the organ. The Churchman says: "It will doubtless increase the already favorable impression that Mr. Stewart has made since being identified with the musical life of Boston."

—The Music Critic

The Pearls will be Real

There have been plays written up to and around many objects since Nicholas Nickleby participated in a drama built about a pump. "Blue Jeans" was written around a buzz-saw, and "Under the Gaslight" around a steam engine. But an opera written around a smile is the newest. Edna Wallace Hopper is to have it—"The Laughing Lady." Edna's portrait, with all her teeth showing in a broad laugh, has been familiar to bill posters and half-tone artists for years. She wil not need to have new posters made when she stars in "The Laughing Lady," which is, by the way, not founded in any way upon Mrs. Verdenals's "The Laughing Girl," which Clara Lipman and Louis Mann produced here many seasons back.

Credit to the Helpers

Ernest Seton-Thompson, in his note to the reader prefacing "Lives of the Hunted," explains the part which Mrs. Seton-Thompson takes in the preparation of his books. "The stories are written by myself, and all the pictures, including the marginals, are my own handiwork; but in choice of subject to illustrate, in ideas of its treatment, and in technical book-making and the preliminary designs for cover and title page, and in the literary revision of the text, her assistance has been essential. In giving special credit for the book-making, I am standing for a principle. Give a person credit for his work, and he will put his heart in it. Every book lovingly made should bear the maker's name; then we should have more books of the kind that the old masters left behind." In this Mr. Seton-Thompson is carrying out an idea expressed some time ago by J. H. Bulloch, English correspondent of the Book-Buyer. Mr. Bulloch suggested that the general public would take more interest in knowing who was responsible for perfect typography and press work than in who edited or annoted a book, and he suggested that, instead of letting some learned obscurity earn a vicarious fame by having his name appear on the title page of some reprinted classic, it would be more to the purpose to let the real book-maker reap the reward of his labor. Then we might have modern printers and publishers, whose names would be as well known and stand for as much as any of the celebrated craftsmen of earlier centuries. It is becoming quite common, however, within the last few years, for publishers to give due credit, on the reverse of the title page, to the printer or pressman, if not both, and lovers of books are learning to know that certain firms can be depended upon to produce good work. It will take some time before the whole public is educated, but there is no reason in the world why the names of book-makers should not be as well known as those of other manufacturers, and why the purchaser intent on excellence of workmanship and good taste should not ask for the productions of some favorite publisher, just as one asks for French china or cut glass.

Stoddard's "Footprints"

It is all too seldom that the veteran Charles Warren Stoddard places his name on a title page, and we have, therefore, double reason for rejoicing in his latest book, which cannot fail to be of special interest to Californians. Mr. Stoddard left New York, a boy of twelve years, for the distant land of California and the first half of his volume, "In the Footprints of the Padres," details his recollections of the voyage upon the two oceans and across "the isthmus," and life in the early days of San Francisco. Pioneer days and pioneer times have been described by all sorts and conditions of people until there would seem to be but little left to tell, but Mr. Stoddard has given us a new point of view, that of a child when children were few. There is hardly a page that does not yield some gem of description or some reminiscence that sends the mind wandering back to the days that are no more. Telegraph Hill, with its tiny houses clinging like birds' nests, where "their garden-plots were set on end; they must needs adapt themselves to the angle of demarkation; they loomed above their front yards while their back yards lorded it over their roofs"; Black Point, a wilderness of scrub oak; the old "plank road" to the Mission Dolores, then a separate settlement, the Willows, Russ Garden, South Park and Lone Mountain. There are a boy's glimpses of the wide-open gambling houses, strolls through Chinatown, journeys of exploration and adventure beyond the limits of settlement, and that primitive industry of smelting the solder from old tin cans, by which the young Argonauts put money into their purses. The temptation toward making extracts is withstood only by the difficulty of choosing selections. "A Memory of Monterey" recalls the "dear, old, stupid town" of but half a dozen thinly populated streets, before she fell into the hands of a Croesus" and became a summer resort. "Inland Yachting," "Egg-Pickers of the Farallones," "A Bit of Old China," and "In a California Bungalow," make up the remainder of the contents. Some ninety pages under the title "A Mysterious History" are devoted to the story of Theresa Longworth, Lady Yelverton, Viscountess Avonmore, whose singular history was the basis of Wilkie Collins' novel, "Man and Wife," and who came to San Francisco on a lecturing and elocutionary tour which proved a dismal failure. The illustrations are of unusual interest since they are mostly reproductions of contemporary photographs; there are two drawings by Peixotto, and the cover design, by McQuaid, represents a procession of friars against the sunset sky entering the church of the Carmel Mission. It is a pity that a book so meritorious in every other respect should be marred by inexcusably careless proof-reading. One can hardly pardon even the compositor of San Francisco for such slips as "Knob" Hill or Josiah "Joyce," and these are but two of a host. "Footprints of the Padres" is published by A. M. Robertson and adds one more to the number of exceptionally artistic volumes which he has lately produced.

The Divorce Question Novelly Treated

'Let Not Man Put Asunder" is a novel treating with the divorce problem, and handling the same without gloves. Though it deals primarily with the lives of Petrina Faneuil and Henry Vassall, they are not the only characters who play with the fire, and though the principal scenes take place in Boston, there is a shifting to London and Italy before the final dropping of the curtain in Boston. Petrina Faneuil, the last of her family, inheriting wealth and position, decides to marry Henry Vassall, a descendant of the Puritans. Petrina's main motive in marrying is to obtain more liberty. "Her attitude towards marriage was that which she assumed towards the world; it was not to give but to get; not to enter into a husband's life, but to absorb a husband's into her own." Vassall has views almost diametrically opposite. He is of the opinion that a man is the head of the family and believes in the permanency of matrimony, while Petrina regards it as a "temporary co-operation," and from the first has planned for a speedy divorce. A pretext for separation is found within a year from the marriage and divorce follows in due time. A daughter of the Vassalls, married to Sir Humphrey de Bohun, has become a leader in the Prince's fast set in England. She flirts, gambles, and neglects her children, and finally, with a view primarily to marrying some one else, divorces her husband, in order as she says to give her children a father. Dick Lechmere, another scion of Puritan stock, has divorced his wife, an operatic prima donna, for good and sufficient reasons. These are the principal actors in the drama. Though there is no question about the stand which Basil King, the author of the novel, has taken about the advisability of seeking divorce on trivial grounds, there is less certainty about the desirability of holding man or woman bound through life to an undesirable partner. It is not the resort to divorce in cases of necessity, but the abuse which is the crying evil. It is possible that an occasional and exceptional woman, in families where divorce has not yet become all but hereditary, may look her position squarely in the face, and see herself as second-rate and damaged goods, but it will be only the exception. Mr. King is undoubtedly right in setting forth the social ostracism of the separated as the solution of the problem, but it is not so easy to see how society is to be brought to view the matter in this light. Mothers, themselves divorced, cannot refuse recognition to daughters who have followed in the path where they have led, nor can fathers and husbands insist on drawing a line which will exclude their own relatives. The woman of social position today who attempted to make distinctions based on divorce would find herself alone in her mansion. When ministers and legislators head the scrambling procession to the divorce court, and lawyers put forth their noblest efforts in finding loopholes in the law, who is there to make public opinion? The state of society as Mr. King describes it in the fast set of England will do very well as descriptive of smart society anywhere else. "Let Not Man Put Asunder" is a sane and wholesome book and the situations and conversations are by no means confined to discussions of the divorce question. There are some intensely dramatic scenes, some of them not without a touch of comedy. The conversations sparkle with wit, without being so intensely brilliant and epigrammatic as to be unnatural. This is one of the series of novels dealing with special phases of American life the publication of which was undertaken some time ago by the Harpers and the venture has given us some of the most notable, if not the best selling books of the year.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff, vs. William Henry Weston, Defendant. } Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

THE WAYS OF WOMEN.

The country lass delights to read
Of fashion's gilded train;
Her hero is a noble youth;
She sighs and sighs in vain.
But when a lordly specimen
She sees among the crowd
With monocle and all the rest,
She giggles right out loud.

The lady fair of high degree
To shepherds turns her heart,
She fain would hear the echoes ring
Unto his carols smart.
But when she sees a farmer boy
And hears his rustic lay,
She looks at him through a lorgnette
And says: "Oh, what a jay."

HIS ANSWER BETRAYED HIM.

"Kindly pass the sugar."

This was the modest request of the young woman at the far end of the table. She was startled almost into hysterics at the frown that heavily wrinkled the brow of him to whom she preferred her desire. She had roused the gentleman from a brown study.

"No, my dear madam," he said, with courteous firmness, "the rule has just gone into effect. No more passes on our road."

The young lady boarder had disturbed the revery of the assistant secretary of the N. L. S. R. R.

NO WIFE TO ABSTRACT HIS COIN.

"That man is a bachelor," said Sherlock Holmes, indicating a solid citizen who had just paid his fare to the conductor.

"Why, how can you tell?" asked the amateur.

"He keeps his coin in his trousers pocket," answered the great detective.

"Well, so do I," returned the amateur, a married man.

"Ah, but note his unworried expression. He had no doubts when he placed his hand in his pocket that he would find the same sum that he had placed there the night before."
—The Passenger.

ENTITLED TO EARN THE MONEY.

"Hey, Hardup, isn't it time you paid back that dollar you borrowed last month?"

"Why, Skinflint, old man, I worked so hard getting it out of you that I think I earned it."

"Lovidove and his wife seem very much in love with each other."

"Hypocrites."

OUR OPINION

The Passing of the Dole Regime

With the appointment of Colonel Sam Parker to succeed Governor Dole in office comes the end of a notable era in Hawaiian affairs. He contributed as much as any man to the overthrow of the native kingdom and the floating of the Stars and Stripes over the new territory. But having prepared the way for the Americans and for the coming of American ideas, he stopped short, congested with conflicting emotions. As the first governor of the new territory, a rare opportunity was offered him to become the channel through which the new American spirit should be diffused over the islands. But his long course of training under the monarchy gave him peculiar ideas regarding the autocratic position of the governing power. He showed this dominant trait on times and occasions that made him strong and bitter enemies. They believed he governed more like a king than a man selected to direct affairs under a Republican form of government; they resented not only his manners but his actions. It was all plain sailing with Sanford B. Dole up to the time he became governor of the territory. From that time several powerful combinations were made against him. They became more active when he drew his authority from Washington, for in that place they found what they had so long wanted—a higher power to which they could readily appeal. The governor was surrounded and heartily backed by strong and influential partisans, but the intrepid and tireless coalition kept hammering away till at last they wore a hole through his defences—and Washington began to listen to the unceasing complaints. He was flatly accused of arbitrary and high-handed usurpation of the functions of the Legislature, with attempting to coerce that body into accepting his will as a sufficient reason for action—with, in fact, playing the part of a petty king. That he was not always right in his policies or correct in his judgments is demonstrated by the fact that his decisions in land matters were repeatedly overruled by the Interior Department when sent up for confirmation in the regular order of business. For the better part of the time he was at war with a large element of the natives as well as a large number of influential men on the islands. His retirement will have an immense influence in settling lively differences which have disturbed the territory ever since his appointment. Whatever reputation he has won since the question of Hawaiian annexation first arose will be accorded him for the good work he accomplished before the Stars and Stripes were raised rather than for what he has done since that event. That he failed to grasp the true spirit of American institutions and to govern in accordance with it was more the fault of his temperament than his understanding.

American Girls Chaperoned in Paris

"Don't come to Paris without chaperons" is the advice that Mrs. Gowdy, wife of the American Consul-General at Paris, is writing to her friends in this country. She explains that a residence of five years in Paris "convinces me that American girls coming here without a chaperon make a grievous mistake. It is very delightful in the United States for young girls to go without an eternal chaperon at their heels, but when one comes here unaccompanied, all our explanations about her independence do not save her from cruel remarks by clubmen, boulevard lawyers and even from members of her own sex who are not so pretty." Of course the rugged "new woman" will scoff at this advice and it is to be hoped that the sensitive girl with aspirations for art who has planned to study abroad will treat it as lightly. Why switch one's future on account of wicked remarks of street loungers, or club cads? One does not have to go to Paris to find species of their kind. The experiences in this line of those who have cut out an art career for themselves have been pretty much the same in London, Berlin, Paris, New York and San Francisco. A good woman need have no fear of malicious remarks at home or abroad, and no ambitious American girl of any spirit will be daunted by the warning published by Mrs. Gowdy.

Why Not Color the Hair Pea Green?

A New York chemist is standing suit for damages incurred by an actress who used some of his preparations with a view to coloring her hair a coveted auburn hue, instead of which it came out pea-green, and she demands monetary compensation for her wounded feelings and damaged locks. The chemist has made answer alleging that the fault lay not in his preparation but in its unskilful appliance, and has called in experts to support his assertion. This is "ye ancient and honorable defense" in such suits and the usual outcome is easy to guess: the physician will save his fee, that is, as much of it as his lawyer doesn't mulct him of, and the lady will retire with her pea-green hair. But if beauty-hunting woman is determined to change the color of her hair and nature's handiwork, why shouldn't pea-green satisfy her? That color most frequently matches the complexion of the women who want to change the tint of their hair. Certainly it is distinctive and striking, and that seems to be the better part of the object sought. Likewise is it beautiful. Mark the lovely green effects on the vain, strutting pea-fowl, the very bird of beautiful, high-born Venus herself. Odd as it may seem, this same pea-green color is one selected by Nature into which she sometimes changes the color of the shocks she has hurriedly turned out. To be sure, it is one of her wild, weird, chemical changes, but so are the changes brought about by "beauty doctors," so that ought to commend it to aspirants for a new colored top-knot. Up in northern California the workmen engaged in certain smelting operations about a copper mine all have their hair and beards turned a beautiful effulgent pea-green. The color sticks, too, and doesn't lose its vividness and grip with a few paltry latherings of soap and water. People go to the springs to benefit their color and complexions; why shouldn't ladies with aspirations for a brighter and more unique coiffure go to northern California and sit about the vicinity of the copper smelters till they take on a lovely pea-green covering? Pea-green can be made the fashionable hair color in time. More than one philosopher has declared that most anything can be made fashionable by the proper business handling. Hail the day, then, when this new pea-green top-gear shall lead the procession of Titian "blondes," strawberry "blunders," blackberry brunettes, chestnut browns, salmon "pinks," cream-colored "bronzes," tow heads, French brunes, Albino "freaks," pink-eyed "beauts," plain snub-nosed "mixed" and all the other blends, brands and "blunders" turned out by the so-called beauty doctors.

Mrs. Meynell's Literary "Dog Biscuit"

"Extract of Ruskin" is what a certain critic has seen fit to call Mrs. Meynell's volume in the series of "Modern English Writers." The same critic refers to these condensations as "literary dog biscuit," and seems to consider it a species of desecration that any one should admit the desirability of taking a short-cut in order to become somewhat familiar with the style and opinions of the literary demigods. The simple, plain truth is that no author is always at his best, and those who have been prolific in their printed productions have given forth much that is of no particular worth or interest. There is no reason why one should consider every paragraph and sentence of Ruskin or Dickens, or Carlyle, or any of the rest of them, as inspired. Life is no longer a simple matter, and the scholar of today, no matter what his inclination, must earn his dry bread in some other way than by poring over dusty and moldy manuscripts. A busy man or woman may have the best of intentions with regard to voluminous authors of standard reputation, and yet be appalled by an array of a dozen volumes of close print, with never a hint of guidance as to what will make good skipping. It does not follow necessarily that the time saved by taking Ruskin a la Liebig will be devoted to the latest popular novel. A judicious and well edited selection will often prove more palatable than the compact original. This is especially apt to be the case with authors of a bygone generation.

Predicament of the Cheap Magazines

It is reported that the cheap magazines are on the verge of literary bankruptcy. They cannot obtain a sufficient quantity of good manuscript to keep themselves going, for although they are deluged with articles of all kinds, the mass of it is so poor in quality as not to be worth printing. One would like to know the origin of the report, for, as far as one can be judged by the contents, the ten-cent magazines are not doing badly. It is true that not all of them are on the same level, and the degrees of excellence in any one of them varies from month to month, but on the whole the astonishing point is that they can give so much material and of such good quality for one dime. The theory which has gained currency that any kind of pen work, whether it be sneered at as journalism or respected as literature, is remunerative, has set a horde of people writing, or at least attempting to write. Absolute ignorance of grammar, spelling, punctuation, or any other of the fundamental requirements does not debar aspirants; and the idea that their valuable contributions can by any possibility be rejected is the last thing which occurs to them. First-class productions in any branch of writing always command a premium. Good second-class articles are none too plentiful, but tons and tons of "fair to middling" grade and inferior stock which are passed back and forth, and go the rounds of rejection, simply help to support the Post Office Department. No doubt the publishers of cheap magazines have strongly commented on the quantity of worthless manuscript which they have been obliged to decline. The same complaint comes likewise from the publishers of the high-priced publications. If courtesy did not seem to demand that articles unsolicited should be either returned or kept until called for, such useless manuscripts would go a long way towards canceling coal bills and keeping the editorial blaze going. However, if the advertising patronage of the leading cheap magazines continues to hold out as heretofore it is safe to say that the managements will discover something readable to print on the few pages devoted to "literature."

The Saunterer

Lily Lawler's Paris Triumph

Friends of Lily Lawler, who were rather disappointed when the word came from Paris that her voice would never scale the heights of grand opera, may console themselves with the fact that Miss Lawler has achieved social prominence in the American-Paris smart set, a distinction not easily won nor lightly held. Santos-Dumont, aerial navigator, and social lion, is responsible for Miss Lawler's debut into "high life," though the ascent was not accomplished by means of his air-ship. Santos-Dumont has been most devoted to Miss Lawler and the match-makers are tuning their ears for wedding bells, which they bill to chime after Dumont's next trip. This is probably mere gossip, but there is no doubt that M. Dumont takes a warm interest in Miss Lawler. The "flying" man is the hero of the hour in Paris, and is feted by the Faubourg St. Germain, and courted by resident foreigners with the social virus. Fancy the chagrin of the latter class, whom M. Dumont has rather snubbed, when they saw a Califorienne without wealth the recipient of marked favor from the sky soarer, and enjoying the coveted social "boost" which such attention naturally carried in its wake. For the past three months Miss Lawler has been received by ancient families in the Faubourg St. Germain, to which even the Mackay gold has not paved the way for Mrs. Mackay. Old friends of the Lawlers in Honolulu and San Francisco will rub their eyes twice at this, but Santos Dumont has accomplished for Lily what money often fails to do.

Mrs. Spreckels as a Fairy Godmother

Mrs. Gus Spreckels' part in Miss Lawler's triumph cannot be overlooked. When Mrs. Spreckels and Lurline left Paris for a brief jaunt to California, they put their gorgeous equipages at Miss Lawler's disposal. The coachman was given orders to report daily at her apartments and Miss Lawler "took the air" in the luxurious carriages that have been the wonder of the Bois. On the day that Santos Dumont first barely missed winning the Eiffel Tower prize, she drove up after the descent, the magnificent turnout, with its handsome trappings and liveried flunkies attracting more than passing glances from the crowd. M. Dumont, receiving the congratulations of his friends, saw that the attention of the spectators was roving toward some new arrival. He followed their glances and his eyes rested on the young American girl, sitting in solitary state in the Spreckels' carriage. The man who knows the feel of riding with the clouds inquired the name of "La Belle Americaine." Pouf! her reputation was made. Santos Dumont had singled her out. Ah, la, la, la, of such stuff social success is made. He asked to be introduced and Miss Lawler's triumph was done to a crisp. Nor did it make any difference to Mr. Dumont, when he heard some time afterward that the carriage was only borrowed and "La Belle Americaine" was merely an aspirant for musical honors and the protegee of wealthy friends. Santos Dumont graciously allowed Miss Lawler to give a tea in his honor. With such a lion as the magnet, the tea of course drew a smart crush, and snobs in the American colony, who had hesitated about receiving Miss Lawler, were glad to go to her apartments and eat humble pie. So if the Spreckels' carriage was not a "pumpkin coach," Mrs. Spreckels is undoubtedly the fairy godmother of the affair.

She was Born Under a Lucky Star

Astrologers would certainly not have much difficulty in stamping Lily Lawler as a girl "born under a lucky star." Her father at one time managed a hotel in Honolulu and afterwards engaged in the same business in San Francisco. When the family moved to this city Lily's musical ability brought her into touch with the music lovers in the smart set. She had a pronounced talent for making valuable friends, which some unkind critics said was even greater than her musical talents. After her mother's death a wealthy patroness sent her to Paris to have Marchesi put the finishing frills on her promising voice. But the voice has not developed into anything bigger than a delightful drawing-room attraction. After her father's death Miss Lawler returned to San Francisco for a brief visit. His estate netted her an income of about one hundred dollars a month. However, Mrs. Spreckels and other San Franciscans in Paris have strewn her path with the flowers her income could not purchase. And now comes Santos Dumont, puts the seal of his approval on her, and bien! Lily Lawler becomes a social lioness only less mighty than M. Dumont himself. While she is enjoying her Paris triumph he is sailing through the blue skies along the shores of the Mediterranean, trying to perfect his dirigible balloon so that it will capture the one hundred thousand dollars offered by the St. Louis Fair management for the best ship to navigate the air.

Paul Neumann, the ex-Bohemian club president, who died a few months ago, was a Jew by birth, but did not live up to the tenets of his forefathers. He was buried by the Masons, to which order he belonged. Mrs. Neumann, the widow, is of Spanish birth, and is a devout Catholic. Now I hear that, she has been grieving to a heart-rending extent because she fears that she can never meet her Maker on the Judgment Day until her late husband's ashes are exhumed and buried again according to the rites of her church. In furtherance of these wishes she wants to have the body moved, but certain friends oppose her on the score that such action will create a lively discussion. It would be interesting to know what the object of the controversy would have to say in the matter were he to return to his old haunts. It would likely be something to be recorded in Bohemia, for Paul Neumann dearly loved to make sport of the things of life.

Trying to Reach the Goal of Fame

Vivian Sartoris, granddaughter of General Grant, will not find it an easy matter to enter the Beaux Arts. She is fitting herself for the examinations, but there is a wide gap between private ateliers and the national school which many students fail to span. The number of pupils admitted is limited and foreigners are not given first preference—in fact, they have to score so high in the entrance examinations that few of the many foreign aspirants ever manage to enter. It would be folly to fancy that any bars will be taken down for Miss Sartoris to vault over and if her mind be half as fickle as her heart there is not much hope of her ever being enrolled on the coveted Beaux Arts register. It was Vivian Sartoris who announced in a crowded Washington drawing room that Croesus, not Cupid, is the modern matchmaker. Miss Sartoris declared that she herself hungered for love.

Thought of the Proposals She might Miss

Her cousin, Miss Florence Mason of Alameda, evidently hugs the same idea to her heart. Three years ago, when Miss Mason was a senior at the University of California, she inherited a snug little fortune. The Masons are near relatives of the Grants, and have for years resided in a fine old Alameda mansion. Florence was the beauty of her class at college, and was the first co-ed to popularize the posteresque mode there. She prided herself on her reed-like slimness, and had the fatal faculty of making even prettily plump suddenly appear gross in comparison to her finely drawn angles. When the news of Miss Mason's gift from Dame Fortune traveled campusward, she was treated to a shower bath of congratulations, which she ducked, naively answering: "Oh, I don't know that I'm so glad. I'm afraid now that some poor man who may fall in love with me will not propose for fear he'll be classed as a fortune-hunter. Think of the proposals I may miss!" This certainly has the real "Vivianesque" ring.

Could Break the Bank if He Tried

The recent attempt of Lord Rosslyn to break the bank at Monte Carlo has brought out a lot of half-forgotten stock anecdotes of the place. One of the most curious is that regarding the Wandering Jew. The first person, according to this legend, to enter the gaming room at Monte Carlo, the day after Good Friday—the one day in the year when the rooms are closed—is an old man of venerable aspect. He wastes no time, as do many of the habitues, in seeking to divine what number is likely to appear, but with the trembling fingers of extreme age places his coin upon a certain number. The wheel is turned and the croupier calls out the winning number. Invariably the old man wins and invariably he snatches up the coins with a savage exclamation and hurls them about the room as he hastens from the Casino. The legend is that until he can lose the Wandering Jew must haunt the earth.

Hanging the Club on the "Color Line"

Will it all end with the remnants of the good old California club being hung out on the "color line" for town and gown to gibber at? Several rabid, battle-scarred campaigners boast that that will be the end. Some of the "dreamers, theorists and fanatics," as Mrs. Lovell White is reported to have characterized one wing of those who forced the club to consider the "color line" snarl, are elatedly declaring that they hope her resignation will be accepted so quickly it will make her dizzy. The effort under Mrs. A. D. Sharon's leadership to influence her to withdraw the resignation does not daunt them a bit. Out of the rack, din and smoke of battle comes the defiant chorus of the "old guard" that "that vote'll show Mrs. White that she couldn't run things." From the other side rises the wailing explanation that it was all the work of a roving band of society bushwhackers, full of impracticable ideas, self-advertising schemes and money-making plans, who had been relentlessly suppressed by Mrs. White and they took advantage of Tuesday's fateful scrimmage to "get back at her," woe's the day!

Clubbing the "Angels of Discord"

One wing explains the recent fierce outbreak on the ground that the club of late has been growing too fast. The Board of Directors recognized this fact and tried to make admissions more difficult. Such action roused intense feelings in certain quarters and charges were fired into the opposing camp "that some people seem to think that this club is simply a chance to rehabilitate themselves in a social way, or, what is just as bad, a golden opportunity to social recognition." One resolute champion came out and boldly put herself on record by saying further, "Add to these certain disciples of the gospel of push—the camp 'hornets' who have set one society after another by the ears, those angels of discord: take all these elements and a club—becomes a bludgeon. Thanks to our democratic principles the tinker's daughter or the retired servant girl can elbow the woman whose mother is a Vere de Vere, and the erstwhile keeper of a cheap boarding-house can outvote, certainly outtalk, the lady of Nob Hill.

Troubles of the Uere de Ueres

It is all right to talk of social equality, it sounds well to say that we are all working for the betterment of humanity, but the one fact remains—whenever a chance comes for the graduate of the back alley to smite Vere de Vere, it is done—every time. She smote Vere de Vere with her vote at that terrible meeting.

That Lamentable Barnes Incident

The "Barnes incident" isn't settled yet by any means, as was proved at a recent meeting when the secretary's friends tried to save her and Mrs. President Sharon left the room, declaring that any action taken after her withdrawal from the chair was unofficial. Mrs. White's friends claim that Mrs. Secretary Barnes, in an adroit way, "aided and abetted the rude, obstructionary and filibustering tactics of the radicals on the fateful Tuesday when they tried as hard as they could to confuse Mrs. White." During the fall of motions, amendments, cues for order, etc., that was rained upon Mrs. President White, she asked Mrs. Secretary Barnes to move up beside her and assist in keeping tab on them. And now the great question is, did she "defiantly laugh and toss back her head" because she gleefully thought Mrs. White was becoming confused; or did she simply laugh and ignore the appeal; or did she "protest in a stubborn manner and exhibit herself as a contumacious rebellious little officer"; or did she flatly say, "I won't," as some aver? At any rate Mrs. White had to appeal to the house to have the secretary go up on the platform beside the president and take down the motions. The incident, like a score of similar ones, showed the spirit that characterized that much lamented and fateful Tuesday's meeting. And the friends of Mrs. White are determined that it shall not go uncorrected.

Who will Capture the Coveted Prize?

If the color line champions can keep Mrs. Lovell White out of the presidency, who will win her coveted position? It is pretty well understood that if Mrs. White can't be "saved" her friend, Mrs. A. D. Sharon, will follow her outside the club's portals. Two women are said to be quietly and steadfastly working to gain the honor, Mrs. George Law Smith and Mrs. C. Mason Kinne. Already the ardent friends of Mrs. White are after the chignon of Mrs. Smith. "Where was Mrs. Smith on the fatal day?" they ask, sarcastically. "Why didn't she redeem her promise to place herself on record and speak against the obliteration of the color line?" To cap this they have dug up her society record and they gleefully blazon the discovery that "she started as a society charity worker at the old Author's Carnival." "Why," they wail, "oh, why did she and two other ladies become apostles of blackballing in Sorosis and try to keep the club ultra select; oh, why?" And they talk of the old Colonnade days and things that have slipped into forgotten past of most people. As for Mrs. C. Mason Kinne, they remember how neatly she slipped into the chief office of the Woman's Relief Corps at Rockport, Ill., when three states were struggling mightily for the prize and they wonder if she will as readily see her way clear in the present mix-up to slip into the coveted seat.

Who is the Princess?

When Mrs. Herman Oelrichs and her fifteen elusive trunks are safely anchored in town, several fair maidens intend to solve the mystery of Fred Hotaling's rumored engagement. Mr. Hotaling has lately returned home from a three months' visit in New, York, and while there his heart was either lost, strayed or stolen. As Mrs. Herman Oelrichs is supposed to be the match-maker who introduced him to his divinity, on a certain evening at a very swell dinner at Sherry's, she will be able to name the fair unknown for those in the dark. At present Mr. Hotaling is cultivating writer's cramp penning billet-doux to his lady-love. The young lady is said to be very wealthy in her own right, and as pa's rich and ma doesn't take in washing the affair has plenty of glitter. The Hotalings themselves are not in want, so if Cupid has really pierced their hearts it will be a brilliant match from every view-point.

The Robinson Reillys May Settle Here

It is more than probable that the Robinson Reillys will settle in San Francisco, as this is the only place where they are really "it," and Mrs. Goad-Martin-Reilly does not relish being an outsider elsewhere. Genevieve Goad's new husband is handsome, and dresses after the latest style. For years he assiduously hunted to capture a big "dot," and he was at last unusually fortunate in finding it, accompanied by the beauty of the Coast. Mrs. Reilly has something like three hundred thousand dollars. Her husband is said to have enough for his expenses, so they need not worry over their board bills for some time to come. The Reillys in Washington are a nice family. Mr. Reilly's sisters are said to be charming, but they are not the real thing socially. I learn that one of the great objections the Goads had to Robinson was his name. "Martin," they declared, "was bad enough, but Reilly is worse."

New Pace of the Smart Set

Society is auditing its accounts now that the season is singing its swan song, and "Extravagance" is the epitaph that will ornament its bier. The smart set has put more money into circulation than is usually scattered in half a dozen seasons. Mrs. McBean's famous lament delivered several years ago, "Living is so riotous now, that one can't give even a small dinner for less than a hundred dollars," would be a welcome dirge these days for the cost has more than doubled. People not only live better but they dress infinitely better. Perhaps at no function is the loosening of the purse strings so evident as at weddings. Presents are costly beyond the dreams of yester year brides. A belle who married about seven years ago averaged the cost of her gifts and decided that fifty dollars apiece was a fair estimate. An experienced eye that ran over Mary Scott's presents averaged them at three hundred dollars apiece. Of course, the few gifts, like jewels and solid silver services that cost thousands, brings up the average of the less costly presents. But every gift is an expensive article that will not jar in elegant surroundings. The strain on the people in society whose position is in inverse ratio to their incomes has been terrific. This "poor but proud" contingent will sigh Te Deums when the season's wedding bells are hushed.

A Record in Costly Presents

Elaborate as our wedding presents have grown, they are bagatelles compared to the royal gifts received by Lady Helen Stewart and Lord Stavordale, whose recent wedding was the most brilliant affair London has seen in a decade. Two princesses, eight duchesses and scores of the lesser nobility were present. The wedding gifts numbered seven hundred and were worth one million seven hundred dollars at a modest estimate. This means the average value of the presents was about $2,500. Lord Stavordale's gifts to his bride were alone valued at half a million and King Edward and Queen Alexandra presented her with a magnificent diamond and turquoise brooch.

Helped Her Dad in the Same Fix

Here is a story that has just come to light regarding one of the venerated Bishops who was a prominent delegate at the recent Episcopal convention. He is advanced in years, somewhat infirm and frequently visited the sunny nooks in the Park for the benefit of his health. After sitting one afternoon for some time on a cosy seat he found his joints a trifle stiff and had some difficulty in rising. A dowdily clad little girl and her infant brother were passing at the time. She promptly ran up, exclaiming, "Let me help you; I can help." The elderly Bishop smiled at her kindly earnestness, and said, "It's good of you, little girl, but I hardly think you're strong enough." "Oh, yes, I am," she replied promptly, "I know I am, 'cos I often help dad when he's a worse sight drunker 'n you are."

Heve Taken to Tea Drinking

There was a time when middle-aged women of San Francisco threatened to pass the rest of their lives in playing cards. They took lessons in bridge whist, and they used to figuratively scratch each other's eyes out over should win the prize. Oddly enough, this winter society has been trying to drink itself to death on tea. At nearly every house tea is served, and girls who make from fifteen to twenty calls in an afternoon tell me when they reach home at night they fancy themselves perambulating teapots. Mrs. Walter Dean's card party was the first really fashionable one of the season. This scarcity of card parties has been brought about by the heart trouble of William P. Morgan. Mrs. Morgan and her daughters have not been going out this winter. Formerly Mrs. Morgan, Mrs. Dean, Mrs. Charlie Josselyn, Mrs. Smedberg, Mrs. Boardman, and Mrs. Gibbs used to hold weekly meetings at one another's houses. Mr. Morgan's illness has broken this coterie of card players, for Mrs. Morgan was the leader of this group.

never put on weeds for him; within a few months after his demise she came out in a dashing combination of black and white. Mrs. Coleman, before her marriage, used to live at the Savoy.

Fate of a Photograph

Leontine Blakeman who was maid-of-honor at the Clark-Mullins wedding, prides herself on never having had her picture in the paper. With eel-like wriggles she has escaped the picture hunters whose business it is to flare up the faces of society maidens. "I never give my picture to the papers," declares Miss Blakeman and she stands pat. When Charlotte Cunningham was married it was agreed that the bridal party should be photographed as souvenirs of the happy occasion. Leontine was one of the bridesmaids and she positively refused to face the camera. "There are so many of us,the papers will surely get hold of a picture and I simply will not have my photograph served with coffee and rolls." But there are worse things, even, than having one's picture in the papers. A certain gallant officer must have carried her counterfeit presentment for it was picked up on the Presidio grounds by a volunteer who forgot to remove it from his pocket when he pawned his uniform. The picture was afterwards recovered in—well, that's another story and even a sadder one than is told about some newspaper half-tones.

"Thank heaven," said Henpeck, to his bosom friend, as they boarded the cars. "here's one train I can step on and walk all over without being called a brute."

Why She Broke Her Engagement

Sybil Sanderson has explained in a private letter to one of her San Francisco friends her reason for breaking her engagement with Count Henri de Fitz-James. Count de Fitz-James is a Roman Catholic and was divorced a couple of years ago. "When we became engaged in America," writes the fair Sybil, "I did not appreciate what a serious obstacle his divorce offered to our union, but on my return to France this matter was discussed and I realized it was impossible that our marriage be celebrated by the Roman Catholic church, and that we could only be married civilly. In view of the religious ideas of the Fitz-James family and social connections, this would lead to an equivocal situation unacceptable to both of us. We therefore mutually agreed to end our engagement and remain the best of friends. Count de Fitz-James will go to South America the beginning of next February with the intention of making a long stay there and I will leave shortly to fulfill engagements in Belgium and Holland and then return to Paris. Don't credit the report that I will forfeit my inheritance from Mr. Terry if I marry again. This rumor is positively untrue. I only inherited half the income from the estate and it was given unconditionally."

That a little thing like waiving the religious ceremony should block Sybil's path to the altar is surprising to the friends who knew her when she took her fences more boldly.

Mrs. Chubby: "Don't grumble, I've done nothing but practice economy ever since we were married."
Mr. Chubby: "Yes, and it's cost me every cent I could make."

Our Girls Have a Word to Say

Mrs. George Law, the pretty New York widow, who is most conspicuous in Paris-American society, declares that the Parisienne is the only woman who can indulge in social gayeties late at nights and not look less beautiful next morning. "Woman here," says Mrs. Law, "stay up late at balls but nevertheless they arise early in the morning to go walking, riding, or dining. I have seen a Parisienne of sixty look pretty after a night's ball. They never seem to grow old or ugly."

Tut, tut, my dear Mrs. George, what about that story of the Countess De Castiglione hiding herself from mortal view when her loveliness faded? And as for Parisiennes being the only late to bed and early to risers there are some girls in this neck of the woods who can look pretty with little or no beauty sleep. I have seen Alice Hager, Caro Crockett-Scott and Alice Hoffman part at a ball at 2 G. M. and meet on the golf links before the town clock struck nine. And there's never a telltale circle or line to prove that Morpheus has been cheated.

Where shall the Line be Drawn in Decollete

Quite a little discussion is now going on here over the decided droop in decollete gowns. At the three last smart dinner dances the prudes were outspoken in condemning the mode. Several young women wore their shoulder bands so low that the inner curve of the arm was exposed—a line that is not beautiful when thus "half concealed, half revealed." So on the score of beauty, if not modesty, these bodices sin. They make the wearer seem about to emerge from her clothes—an effect which is a bit disconcerting. Oddly enough the men are loudest in their criticism, but as yet the din and clatter has not reached the ears of the Peri at the social gate. In Philadelphia, however, the young men have dragged the question into the public market place and there's a lively squall in the Delft teapots of the Quaker City. Eight young men of the swell Belmont Cricket club recently attempted to act as censors over the cut of the gowns of their fair guests at the club hops. Just before last week's dance the members of the club were notified to send to this dance committee the names of the ladies who would be invited. The committee then declined to send cards to several young women whose names were put up and who had attended previous dances.

Disliked the Cut of their Gowns

Committeemen frankly explained that they did not approve the cut of their gowns and also found fault with the method in which they held their trains. Two of the young ladies thus dropped from the list were Miss Edith Chase Lewis and Miss May Hollinshead, both members of wealthy and aristocratic families. Their escorts to be, Philip Watson, a son of the president of the Consolidated National bank and Lewis King, a high official in the Ketson Electric Light company, were naturally furious at this censorship and the families of the young women are indignant. The committee acknowledged that the young ladies' gowns would be de rigueur in New York, but they intend to fight against "full undress" in Philadelphia. The members of the dance committee are eight of the most prominent in the Cricket club and their action is denounced and commended with equal vigor by Philadelphians. These Philadelphians certainly have more courage than our men, for name me an octet of local society leaders who would dare to demand that our women dress according to their ideas. But these doughty Puritans dared to put their objections into writing and then the trouble began to brew which perhaps the Philadelphia lawyers will have to subdue.

Not the Famous Lawyer's Widow

Nearly all of the papers, in referring to the death of Mrs. Homer King's sister, Mrs. Frances Edgerton, last week, spoke of her as the widow of Henry Edgerton. In reality she was his divorced wife. His widow married Dr. W. J. Younger and has been living abroad for some years. She was a music teacher, I have heard, before her marriage, and has always been loyal to her old friends who knew her before she gained social distinction. She made excellent matches for her stepdaughters, two of whom married into the nobility of Germany. But this is not difficult on the continent, as each of the girls inherited about five thousand dollars a year from her mother's estate, and they are nice, well-bred girls. When they lived here they were interested in all kinds of musical societies, and Maude and Bessie belonged to the Saturday Morning Orchestra. The late Camilla Urso was an intimate friend of the second Mrs. Younger and on her professional visits here was always entertained by her. One of the Younger girls is Mrs. Burns Macdonald. Another became engaged to a Rough Rider of high lineage and some fortune, but she afterwards went to New York and became interested in Social Settlement work, something of the Angels of the Slums order.

Her Many Disappointments

Mrs. Frances Edgerton once classed with Mrs. Taverner Graham, the two being considered the finest elocution teachers in this city. The former made a great hit fifteen years ago as Lady Teazle to Walter Leman's Sir Peter, in an entertainment given for a fashionable charity. She had studied in Dresden and later with Steele Mackaye and was a graduate of the Philadelphia School of Oratory. But when she formally went on the stage, five years ago, she did not make the success her friends expected. She appeared in "Mary Stuart" with Modjeska; her voice was too sweet or too light, her gestures too Delsartean for her part, or something of that sort. Anyhow, she failed to please the critics. Mrs. Edgerton had the bitterest feeling for her husband's second wife and always spoke of her as "that woman who is living with my husband."

The Real Reasen of the Break

The first Mrs. Sherwood, Mamie Blethen that was, has a house out in the Western Addition. She is as beautiful as when she was a girl and I am surprised she does not wed. By the way, I have heard a new version of the breaking of the engagement between Mrs. Blethen-Sherwood and Harry Macfarlane, who married Polly Dunn the other day. It seems that Mrs. Sherwood was very fond of her young fiance until she went to Honolulu and saw his relatives. He doesn't show his Hawaiian blood, but his very near relatives are quite black, some of them scarcely speaking English and Mrs. Sherwood decided she could never bear to marry into so much color.

Lord Sholto Douglas "In Beer"

Lord Sholto Douglas, a scion of the Marquis of Queensberry, has bought a seventeen hundred dollar saloon in Spokane and proposes to conduct the place as a business because he and his wife "are tired of notoriety and want to settle down to a quiet life." He says he has about fifty thousand dollars left which he is willing to devote to courting retirement. His two children and his wife, the daughter of a San Francisco policeman named Mooney, are with him.

They say, Lord Sholto Douglas, dear,
You think of "going into beer"
To court a quiet spell;
Alas, 'tis not all beer and skittles,
This peddling jags for "weal and wittles";
'Tis often nearly—well,
I hope you'll meet Spokane's gay quizzes
With prime cocktails and brisk gin fizzes,
And all their thirsts dispel.

Alice Nielsen has announced her retirement from comic opera and will make her debut as a concert singer in London, this month.

A Clever Californienne

Eleanor Calhoun has launched herself upon the British public in a new role. Miss Calhoun is one of the most enterprising Californians that ever went abroad. She is the same young woman whom Mrs. Phoebe Hearst designed as a bride for her son, but neither the wealthy widow's protege nor the young newspaper Monarch fell in with the program so kindly arranged for them. She was placed upon the local dramatic horizon by Mrs. Julia Melville Snyder so many years ago that the memory of that effulgent debut still lives in the minds of the friendly audience that cheered "Nellie" on to fame. She got the fame all right. It came with her perfect Paris accent, laboriously acquired on the tongue's native ground, but warranted to stand wear and tear and change of scene. Coquelin, the great Coquelin, spoke of Miss Calhoun in glowing terms when he was in San Francisco. A girl who will go to work and learn to speak real French so that she may act in French plays possesses pure pluck. Miss Calhoun's new venture, with which she will invade the territory hitherto occupied by the Elizabethan Stage Society, is to give "Romeo and Juliet" and other Elizabethan plays strictly in the Elizabethan manner. Arnold Dolmetsch, the musician who plays on antique instruments in "ye old style," will be a feature of Miss Calhoun's productions. Wiliam Poel, the apostle of the Elizabethans, is expected to espouse the new movement and help its projector to conquer the Philistines.

Jennie Blair's New Attraction

The Doctors' Daughters have as much trouble dispensing their largess worthily as they endure in collecting the wherewithal. Of all the members Jennie Blair is most successful in reading an applicant's worth. The sniveling "wife and seven children" sort slink away after one of her keen glances, yet she it is who always wins the confidence of the unfortunates, and into her sympathetic ears are poured the heart-jerking tales. "I don't know how she wins them," complained an ardent worker, "for they just seem to freeze up with me, and yet my heart bleeds for them." "Perhaps it's her Titian locks that attract them," was the irrelevant answer.

"I suppose you would call that capillary attraction," answered Miss Blair, who happened to overhear.

Pretty Priscillas Will Pore over Palms

Lent is not going to be so horribly dull if the younger club women have anything to say in the matter. The Alden club is going to hold an "afternoon with St. Valentine and the other Saints" next Friday at the residence of the secretary, Mabel Adams Ayer, in Clay street. The affair is for the benefit of philanthropic work but the Alden club is in no sense a charity organization, as some of the papers have described it. Jennie McFarland is the president and among the members are Paula Wolff, May Morton, Edna Spinney, Grace Whitney, the Garoutte sisters and Mrs. William Harvey Jardine. Mrs. Jewett, Mrs. Merrill, Mrs. de Greayer and Mrs. Bucknall are associate members. St. Valentine's birthday will be brightly celebrated with a program of music and other things. Mrs. Stroufe-Looseley will give a character sketch in costume. Miss Jean Klink, who has had remarkable success in a clever amateur way in deciphering palms, will be there to read characters by the hand mode. Mrs. Cushing and Miss Morton will also act as palmists.

A Visitor from London

London air agrees finely with some transplanted Californians. Mrs. Holbrook Blinn, who is out here visiting her relatives, is an instance. She has gained wonderfully in poise and style during the years that have elapsed since her last visit here. Her husband is one of the best character actors in London. The Blinns are very happy. They live in a charming flat and entertain everybody who is of importance in ultra-Bohemia. They go in largely for out-of-door sports and "bicycle" as they call it over there. Mrs. Blinn talks English with quite the correct Lunnon accent though "American" is in favor now and has been for the past two years.

She Was an Amateur Once

Mrs. Blinn, who was then Ruth Benson, was a member of the much written about amateur company that had Mrs. Louis Auzerais as its proprietor and star. The little band of players was known as the Lucille Palmer company. Miss Benson had been a member of the Alameda public school department but she found acting more to her taste and shortly after the amateurs came back she joined the Effie Ellsler company and went East. After her marriage to Holbrook Blinn, the latter's chum, Chester Bailey Fernald, staged his Century story, "The Cat and the Cherub," and both husband and wife were given the principal roles. They went to London with it and, with the exception of one or two New York trips and one here, they have remained there.

History of the Auzerais Company

It was nearly seven years ago, by the way, that the Lucille Palmer company took that famous trip to the frozen North. One of the members, Mrs. Arthur B. Price, wrote an elaborate account of the trip in which she referred to the troupe as the Loosewheel Farmer company. The article was a sharp satire on the whole aggregation. Mrs. Price said that the four women in the company had a sisterly fondness for one another because they were all in love with the young leading man (Mr. Blinn). The annals were purely personal and the names given were fictitious but everybody knew who was indicated. The skit appeared in a Toronto paper but was copied here and caused the usual nine days' fierce talk.

Mrs. B. Shortridge: "The doctor says you'll soon be another man."

Attorney B. Shortridge: "That's good. Tell him to send his bill to the other man."

Has Permission to Attend the Ball

Mrs. Guy Scott is not yet well enough to return East. There was never a healthier girl in body or mind than Leila Voorhies and it is a torture for her now to be confined to her room. It is not a dangerous illness but the doctors have prescribed absolute quiet and rest which is the hardest prescription for the active to take. Lieutenant Scott has had his furlough extended so as to stay here with his wife. Both Elizabeth Huntington and Elsie Sperry, who visited Mrs. Scott at Fort Richmond, had planned to entertain her as soon as she is able to enjoy it, but the death of Miss Sperry's uncle will hang crepe on their festivities. The doctors, however, have consented that Mrs. Scott shall have kings ex on the night of the Huntington ball.

The Pandex of the Press, a new publication launched recently amid great promise, made a tremendous splurge over the prospective publication of Mammy Pleasant's memories. It was absolutely silent on the subject in the next number. Few people wonder why.

Music a Lenten Relaxation

"What shall we do next week after the Mardi Gras is over?" That's what society said until Mrs Gus Taylor solved the problem. "Go to the theatre," she said, "and to concerts. It is quite permissible to do that, you know." So society will go to the symphony concert next Friday, unless Madame La Mode changes her mind. Everybody in New York goes to the symphony concerts, whether they are given in Lent or not. It is the proper thing to know all about symphonic music, counterpoint, harmony and themes. Has Such "a Pleasing Way Wiz Her"

Ever since Marie Pichon captured a sugar-coated Oxnard, society has kept its eyes peeled for any other designing maid who might be angling in the matrimonial preserves of the gratin du gratin. Not long ago a Burlingame matron hired a handmaiden who went about her duties as meekly as a lamb and mint sauce. But the young woman must have cast sheep's eyes at Madame's brother-in-law for that worthy gentleman discovered that the maid had a "nice little way wiz her." One night last week Madame's husband was detained in town on business and Madame was left in the big country house with the servants and brother-in-law. Towards morning she was awakened by sounds evidently coming from the stable and decided that thieves were stealing some of the blue-blooded horses. She clanged the servants' bells and managed to rouse the butler who refused however to beard the thieves in their den. It was only when Madame and the cook agreed to accompany him that he consented. When the incongruous trio reached the stable they found only brother-in-law and the maid putting up the team with which they had been enjoying a moonlight ride. Tableau vivant! Madame dismissed maid then and there and marched the errant youth into the house. The repentant girl was forced to sit up at the station and wait for the first train. Madame shipped bag and baggage after her but her drastic action has caused the story of the midnight ride to reach even the ears of the rustics.

Mrs. Roosevelt's Hints to Society

A letter from Hildegarde McKenna to one of her girl friends in this city throws a new light on Mrs. Roosevelt. The first lady of the land may not care for society, but now that it has been thrust upon her she evidently intends to live up to it. Mrs. Roosevelt is at home every Tuesday morning to confer with the Cabinet women and discuss the plans of the week. At the last conference she announced that she was very partial to light colors and expected the ladies to consider her preferences as far as official receptions are concerned. This means that there will be sombrely garbed woman at the White House. Mrs. Roosevelt declared that she especially dislikes black, which will put many handsome black gowns out of commission. This edict in favor of color will be felt in all circles of Washington society and the chances are that in the end Mrs. Roosevelt will look kindly on any black gowns that serve as a sedative to the coming din of color. Mrs. Roosevelt's especial preference is white, so it may mean another pastel season

Afraid to Take the Ransom Now

The abduction of Miss Stone by Bulgarian brigands has reached another unique stage: the committee, carrying the ransom demanded, have been searching the highways and by ways of the banditti-infested country with a view to settling for cash, but not a robber could they unearth who was willing to take the money and deliver up the captive. Now the committee has gone back to Constantinople to wait "for further developments." A cheerful laureate on timely topics rhapsodizes over the situation thus:

The ransom is forthcoming; its subscribers so have grown,
That shortly in our midst we shall observe Miss Mary Stone.
Society is blase, and just aches for a novel craze;
We'll take her up and feed her in our own Byzantine ways.
And Mary looks as though she were well capable to eat;
A heavy load of Stone is she for gastronomic feat.
A Phelan-Greenwood banquet scarce her "tummy" could suffice;
So let us have for her a feed of everything that's nice.

Poker Versus Bridge Whist

Despite bland denials, every one knows that the fashionable hotels and boarding-houses are inoculated with the poker virus. Occasionally the cry "cheat" echoes beyond the stuffed keyholes, and even the doormat knows what's going on inside. Bridge whist has somehow not made a hit with the ladies out here, though it has been press-agented by the fact that elsewhere it rages in swaggerdom. Perhaps, if the ladies could be weaned to it, there would be fewer charges of unfair play. For, according to Mrs. Pat Campbell, New York bridge whist devotees play a "square" game. Mrs. Campbell lays her hand on her heart and swears by the shade of the second Mrs. Tanqueray that never has she played with such "fair" players. But then Mrs. Pat is used to playing in England, don't you know, where they have their little peccadilloes in baccarat if not bridge whist. Mrs. Campbell scouts the idea that she has won twenty-two thousand dollars at the game, but confesses that she did win two thousand dollars one night. "I have asked friends to visit me," she explained, "and we have played bridge whist. Isn't that preferable to gossip? Besides, it doesn't prevent tea and a flavor of gossip besides.

Was a San Francisco Boy

Father A. P. Doyle, whose recent article in the Outlook is being so widely copied, was a San Francisco boy. He hadn't any idea of being a priest but was just out of St. Mary's college when some of the Paulists came here to give a mission. Aleck was a bright and interesting boy and a mutual liking sprang up between him and the holy fathers. Therefore, when one of them suggested that Aleck try the seminary his people agreed willingly enough. Father Doyle's father and three brothers still live here; they are carpenters and builders. His two sisters entered the Order of Mercy. Father Doyle conducted the ceremony in one case.

Absent Athenians

It was the commercial element that saved the Athenian club of Oakland from going to pieces; this fact was acknowledged at the big housewarming held in the Oakland club's new home last Saturday night. At the most critical period in its career the Athenian was assisted to its feet by the very determined effort of John A. Britton, its present president. The housewarming was a very glad event, and the only sad drop in the cup of pleasure was when memory brought back the faces of absent members. Phil Remillard, who was Mr. Britton's right-hand man in rehabilitating the organization, was killed last year by falling from the window of Delmonico's in this city. John Lathrop, another well loved Athenian, is in poor health and went to the South Sea islands some time since. Rev. Samuel Kelly has charge of a parish in Pennsylvania. Among the other absent members were Bert Brayton, W. A. Mix and E. B. Jerome—all three have passed away since the founding of the club.

How Cape Nome was Named

Professor George Davidson, who has been cudgelling his brains and searching high and low for some hint as to the derivation of the name of Cape Nome has at last unearthed the long-sought information. Having about exhausted conjecture, he finally concluded that it was probably given by the expedition of the Herald and Plover, when those vessels were sent in search of Sir John Franklin, and he made inquiry of the Royal Geographical Society in order to discover whether any person by the name of "Nome" accompanied the expedition. It seems that when the chart of the coast was made on board the Herald the point was marked "? Name." This was transformed in copying, first to C. Name, and next to C. Nome (Cape Nome), which it will probably remain.

Daughter of a Pioneer

Adele Perkins, whose engagement to George Gibbs was recently announced, is the younger daughter of William L. Perkins of St. Paul, Minnesota. Her mother, who died a few years ago, was a relative of Mrs. Charles Gibbs, whose son Miss Perkins is to marry. The bride to be has an elder sister, Mabel, who was born in California, and a younger brother, William Jr. Her father, "Billy" Perkins as he is best known to his old-time Californian friends, has only lived in St. Paul during his later years. He was one of the coterie of younger pioneers and thirty years ago was prominent in the local business world as his wife was in society. The Perkins residence was situated in a then very fashionable part of the city, Eleventh street near Mission, and Mrs. Perkins, who was a handsome and gracious hostess, entertained with delightful hospitality. Afterwards this house was occupied by Charles Knox, the grain broker whose daughter Elsie married young Edward Jennings. George Gibbs, Miss Perkins' fiance, is a son of the Charles Gibbs'. His unmarried sisters, Helen, Mary and Virginia, are great favorites in society. Addie married an Eastern man and Sophie is Mrs. Fred Johnson of this city.

Big Prices at the Coronation

Extraordinary stories are floating about London regarding the prices which are being offered for private houses during the coronation season. A gentleman in the Sloane street district has been offered five thousand dollars for three months' use of his home. Another family in Grosvenor Square has been offered twenty-two thousand five hundred dollars for a similar period and is holding out for twenty-five thousand. Of course there will be a big slump in prices as soon as the climax in the coronation festivities is passed. But for the moment the owner of the town house is making a rich harvest under the prospect of Royal sunshine.

Her Brilliant Success

The proposed visit of the Count and Countess von Waldersee to America will give Philadelphia a chance to fly a feather in its bonnet, for the famous Countess' maiden name was Mary Esther Lee, and her father was a Quaker City wholesale grocer. It is not improbable that the Countess will lengthen her journey to San Francisco, as she has always expressed an interest in the queen city of the West. we have sent to Berlin have always found a kind patroness in the all-powerful Countess von Waldersee, who has often been called the "power behind the German throne." Little Alma Stencel's Berlin debut was given the cachet of royalty owing to the Countess von Waldersee's influence. American girls who aspire to titles might take their cue from this compatriot, who has twice wedded into the aristocracy, neither time paying for the privilege. She was morganatically married to Prince Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein in 1864. She was twenty-six years old at the time, and he was seventy. Six months after their marriage Prince Frederick died, leaving her a large fortune, but of course no legal right to his title. However, the widow had sufficient persuasive power to induce the Emperor of Austria to bestow upon her the title of Princess von Noez. She is the only American woman who could ever claim the title of Princess as her own. Princess von Noez was but two years a widow when she married Count von Waldersee, whose brilliant career has been almost entirely due to his wonderful American wife. This will be the Countess' first visit to her girlhood home since making her home abroad.

Celebrated the Ceding of California

Mrs. J. A. Jewett has fully recovered from her long and serious illness, as was apparent by her presence at the reception given by the Women's Auxiliary of the Society of California Pioneers. She received with the other officers of the society and looked very distingue in a black and white toilette. Among the various receptions given last Saturday afternoon none was a more decided crush. But in spite of the crowd it was an enjoyable affair.

Who Raised the Flag?

J. Hoyt Toler, who rendered a solo at the function, was referred to as the son of "William P. Toler, who raised the first American flag in California, at Monterey, on October 19, 1842." Now, the distinction of having raised the first flag in California has in its time aroused as much dispute as the old question of who struck Billy Patterson. It has been answered in all sorts of ways, and the descendants of the famous flag-raiser may in time, if they join forces, become as large and influential a society as the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution. Ask almost any Californian who put up the Stars and Stripes at the critical period, and he will answer, "General Fremont." Ask anybody else and he'll say, "Commodore Stockton." Of course this refers to the raising of the American flag at Monterey in 1846, when California was taken into the Union. An old pioneer tells me that neither the Pathfinder nor Stockton raised the flag, for both were many leagues away at the time. Fremont was the raiser of the bear flag, some time before this, but the credit of raising Old Glory belongs to Commodore John Sloat of the frigate Savannah. He was seconded by Lieutenant Beal, who afterwards became a General.

Crusade Against too much Exercise

The fiat has gone forth that unless the American girl curbs her love for exercise the population census will be as meagre as that of France. This is really a startling statement that staggers at first glance and sounds absurd in view of the wide-spread belief that muscle power is health. But according to experts this is a fallacy that has done much to foster the notion that women and girls who are able to play golf or tennis all day have improved in health in proportion as they have improved in muscle power. But the real reason that the women and girls of today are able to expend so much force upon walking, cycling, tennis, golf and other exercise is because they have withdrawn from other and more valuable faculties and have put it into muscles. The fact that women are growing taller and muscularly stronger is no test at all of physical improvement. The change arises from a lengthening of the lower limbs. Naturally a woman's legs are shorter in proportion to her height than a man's. Modern women's legs are approximating the masculine proportion to height—and this the physiologist claims is achieved by impoverishing the condition and development of important internal organs. Tall, muscular women are by no means, physiologically speaking, the best mothers, and very tall women rarely have children.

The West Noted for Tall Women

San Francisco women have always been noted for towering over their men-folk. The number of tall girls in society is only equaled by the number of squat youths. It is a rare sight at a cotillon to see a man's head bobbing above a woman's shoulder. Helen-Hopkins Taylor is perhaps the tallest woman in the smart set but Mrs. Joe Tobin, Mrs. McCarthy, Edith McBean and dozens of others approach her stature. Our women have always prided themselves on their height and deplored the lesser inches of the men. But now it appears that "long legs" are physiologically dangerous, and over-exercise is held responsible for this new threat to posterity.

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

Her One Experience

Mrs. Helmsley arose from the deep cushioned arm chair and advanced to meet her niece with a look of admiration in her deep gray eyes. The girl was undeniably pretty, pretty with all the freshness, color and spirit that invigorating country air lends to budding womanhood. Her naturally well-rounded figure had acquired lithe strength and suppleness in the simple outdoor sports of Hillsboro. Life and health seemed to shine in the luxurious coils of her brown hair and clear, limpid blue eyes.

"My dear," exclaimed the delighted aunt, fervently kissing the young face, "how came these Hillsboro gallants ever to allow you to escape? But haven't I heard—yes, I remember now: what is his name? Ross Sayres, isn't it? Tell me, has he any claim?"

"Not the slightest, auntie," was the laughing rejoinder, "I'm fancy free."

Mrs. Helmsley was charmed with the keen, naive interest Norma manifested in everything and she determined to make her visit to the city a series of captivating delights. She arranged cosy little teas, took her on the routine calls, planned excursions for her and made the regulation rounds of the theatres and concert halls with a resolute determination that Norma should miss nothing.

One matinee found them at the Victoria listening to the sextet in "Florodora." On Norma's left was seated a well-known young clubman of a reputation that kept him in hot water. But he possessed an excellent family name, was wealthy, handsome and companionable, so his clubmates knocked about with him while their wives only accorded him a bowing recognition. The fresh face of Norma and the delight she took in her surroundings quickly attracted his jaded attention.

"Burke," he whispered, elbowing his companion, a smooth-faced clean-cut man, slightly gray with a deep laughing dimple exactly in the centre of his chin, "Burke, here's a rare Phyllis come to town. I wonder what fly she'd rise to?"

"Behave yourself, Sanders," said the other quickly, "don't attempt any of your pranks here. 'Ware that she-dragon with her."

Sanders smiled to himself and out of the corners of his eye he ran over the fine supple figure of the girl. Presently she became conscious of his gaze and her color deepened. Sanders, who instinctively noted every emotion in his game, noted this and the half-smile on his face gave way as his chin settled resolutely.

A few moments later he covertly tore off the end of one of his cards and under cover of his upturned program he penciled: "THE GEISHAS, AT 4 TOMORROW."

Burke fidgeted uneasily. "Quit that, Sand," he whispered sharply. "Don't try those tricks here. If that she-dragon catches you there'll be trouble."

The lines on Sanders' jaded face set with their old-time purpose, as he softly repeated:

"'Old man, old man, for whom diggest thou this grave?
In the heart of London town?'
And the deep-toned voice of the digger replied,
'We're laying a gas pipe down.'

"Don't worry, old chap, I know my game too well. Watch the play: that's your limit."

* * * * * * * * * *

At the moment when all eyes were centred on the stage where the chorus was singing the finale amid crashing salvos of music, Sanders leaned over and carelessly rested his right hand next to Norma's jacket, hanging from the seat rack in front of her. Under cover of his program he attempted to slip the bit of card into the pockets; but the rack supported the garment so lightly that the instant he tried to press the card into place the jacket fell to the floor, and, dire mishap, it swept with it the program and thereby exposed the card fluttering lightly downward. Norma and her aunt instantly divined what had happened. The exposed card was damnatory proof. Sanders, with a muttered apology, coolly picked up the jacket and handed it to Norma, apparently oblivious of the indignation flashing from the blazing gray eyes of the aunt. The same instant he felt his left arm gripped by Burke who dragged him hastily up the aisle, while he muttered imprecations on such folly. The aunt swooped down on the card like an angry hawk. "THE GEISHAS AT 4 TOMORROW," she read. "The impertinent puppy! What does he mean? I wish there was an officer in sight. Oh, no, I don't; it would create such a scene. But it's so flustering. Come, dear, try to forget it. 'The Geishas at 4.' The idea!"

Norma mentally repeated after her. "The Geishas at 4," but she did not say anything. She was wondering what manner of man this could be who dared to do such things.

Next day, shortly before four o'clock, Burke came sauntering down the street and turned into the marble tiled front of The Geishas. An unexpected wire had called Sanders away and Burke, out of sheer curiosity, was following up the game to discover whether that shrewd Lothario was right or wrong in his surmise of the bright-eyed Phyllis. He passed up the broad aisle, looking among the chairs and tables, and wondered if she would dare to come.

Down the street a few minutes later sauntered Norma. She had just come from Marshall's after having matched a bit of lace for her aunt. She noted The Geishas with a merry twinkle in her eyes and on the big clock hanging outside a watchmaker's she noted it was four o'clock. How daring it all seemed, but then—just at that moment who should step from the broad doorway but the smooth-faced gentleman, the companion of the daring fellow of the card. She noted the laughing dimple in his chin, as he lifted his hat. "By your leave," he said, fearlessly, "I'll walk a step with you." She was too embarrassed at his boldness to answer. What kind of men were these who dared treat women so? She had read of them in novels and she had heard her Hillsboro schoolmates discuss them in the abstract; but here was one in the real flesh and blood. She stole a glance at him. He didn't look like the demon she had pictured. He was fairly good looking and scrupulously groomed but she knew a score of men at home who would please the eye as well. Were his vaunted arts and his wicked wiles as ordinary? He suggested that they return and step into The Geishas for a moment's rest. She had been there one evening with her aunt and a theatre party and she remembered it as a spacious place adorned with elaborate frescoes with smart-looking people eating and drinking at the many small tables, while a string band tried to drown the ceaseless hum of small talk. To be in such a place seemed as safe as being on the street.

When would she get such an opportunity again to study one of these wicked men? What possible harm could there be? He turned as he spoke of The Geishas and for no other reason, except that she could see no harm, she followed him.

When she reached her aunt's home some two hours later she was very flushed and she passed hurriedly to her room, evidently trying to avoid meeting any of the household. Later she sent down word that she had a racking headache and begged to be excused from dinner. At bedtime when her aunt dropped into her room an unwonted luminous light in her eyes and a burning color gave signs of her undue exhilaration, but her aunt attributed them to the headache and declared she'd be all right next day. So they planned to take an early drive in the morning.

Toward the end of the week, however, a change gradually came over her. She became extremely nervous; a drawn look crept over her face and an anxious expression into her eyes. She complained of headaches and kept to her room. Her aunt suggested all sorts of remedies and tried to comfort her but she buried her face in her pillow and refused to be comforted.

As the days passed she began to suffer from hysteria. Then came the day when she arose with a look of resolution in her drawn face. "I'm going home, auntie," she announced, "it's cruel to say it, but I'm thoroughly homesick. I know it's silly, but I must go home. Positively, I must. Please don't ask me to stay any longer."

"Wait a week, dearie," was the reply, "and see if you don't come out of this."

But she was adamant. She packed her trunks that afternoon and the next night was home at peaceful Hillsboro. Her girl friends offered her loads of sympathy when they found she had returned in ill-health. She declared it must be neuralgia, for her head was splitting. But the anxious look never left her face till the afternoon when Ross Sayers, having heard that she had unexpectedly returned, hastened to the house.

Just a week later they were married. Norma only consented to the wedding on condition that it should take place within a week. Ross was more than elated with such a condition. In due time a sturdy little son was born to her. He had a charming dimple in the centre of his chin, which seemed to laugh at her every time she caught herself looking at him. She always hated the child. She never had another.

PAST THE EDGE OF THE WORLD.

I dreamed. And then I thought I lay along
The world's edge, till space drew me unaware
Into its depths, and out I sent a stare
At all the flying stars, a blinding throng.
No hope seemed left to me. I felt the strong
Breath of vast winds ingathering in the air,
And upcaught, I caught hold upon despair,
Which lashed, as slaves are anguished by a thong.

Forward I fell and fell, and a strange night
Eddied about me, what though all the light
Of all the stars went whirling through the dark.
Then, at the end, I cried on Love, on Love—
And there, with what wild wonder not dreamed of,
My forehead felt Love's touch and visible mark.

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought or other fads. Instruction private, not classes. We solicit investigation.

The Book and the Play

Taking everything into consideration, a good book is better than a good play. "In the Palace of the King" the novel, is superior to "In the Palace of the King" the play. But the play is more "popular," since none of Marion Crawford's novels could ever reach the renown implied in that term. Crawford's books are written in English of too fine grade ever to appeal to the vast herd that devours the bucolic and pseudo-historical fictions that belch forth from the publishing houses in such mighty force day by day. In "Via Crucis" he came nearer to penning a "popular" novel than in anything he had hitherto written. "Via Crucis," while dramatically interesting is from a literary point of view far beneath any of its Crawford precursors. "In the Palace of the King," then, while never more than a few steps on the road to becoming a book of the people, is far more dramatic in its chapters than are the scenes of the play constructed from it. The novel holds the interest far more closely than does the play. And, by the way, those censors who publicly plume themselves on never reading modern novels from which plays are taken remind me very much of Little Jack Horner who patted himself on the back for finding a plum in his pie. They cry, "See what a good boy am I" for no virtue at all, unless ignorance of the literature of the day be one. Crawford is not a literary fad. One who goes to the theatre for the purpose of criticism does not go for enjoyment, but to give an impartial and intelligent judgment. It is quite true that those who read the book will not enjoy the play so well as those who left it on the bookshelves until after they had seen the drama. The reason of this is obvious: The play, being written for a star, has all the characters subordinated to Dolores Mendoza, the heroine who afterwards becomes the wife of Don John of Austria. The blind girl Inez is a very cogent personage in the novel, while she has but one important scene in the play—where she goes to the ball in her sister's place. The introduction of the Cardinal spoils one of Inez' best chances of distinction and causes the omission of one of the most charming chapters in the book. This is where Don John, supposedly killed by King Philip and left unattended in his room, is coaxed back to life by the kisses of Inez whom he mistakes for Dolores. In the play the entire sense is changed. It is the peacemaking Cardinal who is the victim of the blade, and Don John is arrested for the murder.

Leaving the novel out of the question it must be universally acknowledged that the combined brains of author, star and playwright have been the means of giving us a romantic drama of direct and brilliant quality, a sumptuous medium for Viola Allen's mobile art. We do not need her name in capitals, as it is on the bill, to know who is the star. It is impossible to figure out what the play would be without her dominating personality. Miss Allen is said to have had many conversations over this play with Mr. Crawford before Mr. Stoddard put his hand to its dramatization. She liked the character of Dolores and had her own ideas of its stage presentment. With the aid of Dolores' creator, added to her own conception, she has evolved a charming creature more French than Spanish, more American than French, and more Viola Allen than Dolores Mendoza. Miss Allen is one of the most convincing stars graduated from the stock schools. She is grace itself in every movement and all her training and natural intelligence are brought to bear upon this part of the loving, faithful and proud Spanish girl. She is winsome and arch in the second scene where Don John, the young conqueror, returns from the wars; fierce and sad by turns in the scene where her father asserts his authority and forbids her to go to the ball; fond and tender and strong in the scene in Don John's rooms. If there is something studied in Miss Allen's art, it is nevertheless always agreeable acting that she gives us. Her finest dramatic work is in the throne room scene, where she makes the useless sacrifice of her name and rouses the nobles to rally around her hero lover. There is a whole scale of expression to run in the six scenes and none loses in contrast with the others. As is usual in a one-star play there is no opportunity for especially noteworthy work from the other players. But the cast as a whole contains ap parently no weaknesses, the ensemble being eminently satisfactory. Mr. Pascoe acts the splendid hero with romantic fervor. Mr. Bonney gives a most effective view of Philip II, the royal villain. Mr. Hoyt as Adonis the court fool, upon whom much of the action of the play falls, is an actor of unusual ability and force and carries his part with discernment. The old Captain who places his duty to his King above his filial affection is faithfully portrayed by Mr. Benrimo, once of the Alcazar company and always a fine character actor. Miss Warren is a sweet and lovable Inez. Miss Prince, who served her apprenticeship in Augustin Daly's company, is a beautiful picture as the wily, revengeful Princess, a character of far more moment in the book than in the play. "In the Palace of the King" is one of the handsomest spectacles ever seen here, ranking in this respect with "Henry VIII." Not a detail is disdained. The supers look as if they could act if given a part on short notice. The little incident opening the second scene, that of the frolicking pages, is an instance of a minor circumstance given prominence that it may add to a perfect whole.

Survival of an Old Melodrama

It is curious how certain plays keep in favor, long after the conditions portrayed in them have changed. Such a one is "Uncle Tom's Cabin"; "The Danites," the Alcazar's attraction this week, is another. Joaquin Miller wrote "The Danites" when California was young. Like the Bret Harte novels it was doubtless an animated picture of early life in our State. But it interests now only as a bit of primitive history. The Alcazar presentation is generous as to accessories and the view of the school-teacher's cabin by moonlight is a jubilee of scenic art. It strikes me, however, that "The Danites," with its heavy climaxes, loud-voiced pathos and corresponding comedy, would be more at home on the Central's stage. The players take their parts very seriously, with too great seriousness in many cases. Notably good acting is that of Miss Wycherly as the schoolma'am who marries the "typical hero of the early days"; Mr. Bacon, as the Judge; Mr. Osbourne as the Parson; Miss Howe and Miss Woodthorpe as the Rough Diamonds; and Mr. Scott as a Danite. Mr. Scott's make-up is worthy of a stronger part.

Alphonse Luttringer, who is now playing small parts at the Grand, was once one of the leading members of the old San Francisco Operatic Society when Adolph Schleicher, Mrs. Madden, Alvina Heuer and Charles Parent were members.

Fulton G. Berry went every night to the Columbia to see "The Princess Chic." Can you blame him? His daughter is certainly one of the best all-round comic opera prime donne on the American stage. She came with a good company, too, and the Kirke La Shelle organization is sure to be well received when it comes here again. It is as strong a band of players and singers as the old-time Bostonians.

Attractions Next Week

"The Ameer" is good to run on at the Tivoli for some time, when "The Serenade" will be given.

"In the Palace of the King" is playing to crowded houses. It runs another week and will be succeeded by one of last season's successes, "Way Down East."

Following "The Danites" at the Alcazar will be a fine production of Henry Arthur Jones' "The Rogue's Comedy." Mr. Willard's famous part of Baily Prothero will be taken by Mr. Alsop who has been studying it for some time.

After "Master and Man" at the Central will come "A Young Wife."

"Jim the Penman" is having an admirable presentation at the Grand this week. Mr. Arden's "Zorah" was such a success that the management will put on another of his plays next week—"Raglan's Way," which had a long run at the old Union Square theatre in New York. The play has a clever plot and gives scope for much dramatic action. The cast will include the full strength of the stock company, with Mr. Arden in the star part of Guy Raglan. The Eastern and Southern press is said to have enthused over his portrayal of the part and the general excellence of the play. It will be mounted in the usual sumptuous manner.

Mary Norman, the talented elocutionist whose refinement and charm are remembered with pleasure by Orpheum patrons, will be on next week's bill. Her specialty is impersonating the society girls of different cities. Dempsey, Mack & Co. have a one-act farce based on a divorce complication. The marvelous Merrills, comedy cyclists, have a new act. Winchermann's trained bears are something quite new, coming direct from Russia via Australia, this being their first American appearance. Rose and Jeannette, the dainty danseuses, will return for one week. Roattino will have new songs. The best of this week's people are on the bill.

From the Plutonian Post

My Dear Barrett: I wish you could have made it convenient to accompany me to earth on the evening of February second, 1902. I took a fancy to attend a first night at the old theatre where you and I played so many years, and which was then the principal playhouse of the city. The place has degenerated to a frightful extent, and now enjoys the reputation of giving the "jayest" shows in town. Mrs. Fiske told me she had heard that her company was the only first class one that had played there in ages.

But Sunday night—queer night for a premier, isn't it?—is what I was intending to describe. I don't wonder now at what we heard of James K. Hackett's dismal failure in "The Pride of Jennico." It was a sure thing. No one could have succeeded in such a play. Why, even you and I, my dear Lawrence, could not have carried the thing. What I do wonder at is that such a play should ever have been seriously considered and sent West; verily, the cast is enough to damn the production without the accessory evils. "The Pride of Jennico" is melodrama gone mad with a vengeance—and it gluts its passion on the patience of the poor audience. As a burlesque of the romantic drama of "The Prisoner of Zenda" order—you remember we saw Hackett in that—with Joseph Hart, May Irwin, Jennie Yeamans, De Wolf Hopper, Frank Daniels and an all-star cast of clever burlesquers to interpret it, I could fancy its having a great vogue. Considered as a burlesque, "The Pride of Jennico" is fine fun, but considered seriously, it cannot hope to invite attention, as experience in the East with a far better cast and brighter scenery has proved. I felt so depressed to see the way our old theatre had degenerated that I came home without attending the joyous supper where the shades of Mrs. Drew, McCullough and others of our friends were to foregather.

Yours affectionately, —Booth.

Modern Valentines

The poster idea has been very cleverly utilized by Elder & Shepard, the publishers of 238 Post street, in a series of most artistic valentines. These are a wide departure from the old-style lace paper valentine and appeal to the understanding as well as to the eye. They are in various shapes and designs, the pictures drawn by artists of some note, and the verses are from the muse of poets who have made more than a local reputation. They are moderate in price, not exceeding in this the lace paper monstrosities, and the designs cover a large field. "A Fool's Alphabet" is a scroll tied with a cardinal ribbon, and the verses begin:

"The teachers all, in every school
Have branded me an awful fool
Because no matter how I try
I learn no more than U—and why?
Because no matter what I do
I care for none excepting U."

There are some bright little valentines for the children, with verses that adults as well as the juveniles will appreciate. These belong to the Youngster series. The "A is for Arrows," an alphabet, has pictures of two little dunces. Another tells how

"Two sleek Crows sat one day
On a fine 'simmon tree.
One was bored, t'other was gay;
What can the matter be?"

A valentine for the "Strenuous" life relates in ready verse how things went in the days of the post-chaise. An acrostic, "To My Valentine," is after an ancient scroll design. The Sphinx, the Dog and the Jack Ass valentines are amusing. An old eighteenth century riddle is printed on Japan vellum and makes a timely love missive. The Hoodlum's valentine is one of Wallace Irwin's bits of southside verse, and is illustrated by Gelett Burgess. These artistic valentines will be pleasing little mementoes to send to Eastern friends. They are all in envelopes ready for mailing. Only a limited edition has been printed.

For Fun

"Junk" is a collection of verses "instigated" by Leon Lempert, Jr., gotten out in a gay cover, colored ink and comic pictures, and is as lively as a clown at a circus. There are twenty-five jingles and rhymes—

A little bit of everything
Picked up from day to day,
A bunch of merry jinglings
To drive dull care away:
And just a touch of seriousness,
But not enough to harm,
For seriousness, I must admit,
Fills me with wild alarm.

The quotation from the introduction gives a sufficient example of the style of the composition, and the subjects treated spring moving, cat concerts, air castles, whistling, and such topics, are familiar to every one. It is "a book to stagger sorrow," and is not meant to do more than lighten a dull half-hour. It is certain to do that. C. M. Clark company of Boston are the publishers.

Handmade Lamps

Typograhpical errors are aggravating enough at any time, and the perfect proof-reader is yet to be evolved, but it seems as if the imp of the perverse takes a particular pride in having a hand whenever a specially nice piece of work is attempted. A Chicago firm of publishers recently got out an edition of Milton's "Ode on the Morning of Christ's Nativity." It was a holiday publication, printed on hand-made paper, and this fact seems to have impressed "ye intelligent compositor," for the seventeenth verse is made to read:

"But see, the Virgin blest
Hath laid her Babe to rest;
Time is our tedious song should here have ending;
Heaven's youngest-teemed star
Hath fixed her polished car,
Her sleeping Lord with hand-made lamp attending;
And all about the courtly stable
Bright-harnessed angels sit in order serviceable."

The Critic used the "Ode" as a special feature of the Christmas number, with illustrations, border, rubricated initials and other embellishments, by Ralph Fletcher Seymour, and has since issued an edition from the same plates, but there also is the "hand-made lamp" in all its glory.

THE ORIGINAL VIENNA BAKERY'S NEW HOME.

The large way in which the Original Vienna Bakery is being patronized shows that its manager, Mr. F. B. Galindo, showed admirable foresight in moving to a more central location than the old quarters in Kearny street. Everything about the new Vienna cafe at 133-135 O'Farrell street is fresh, clean and attractive. The daintiness of its table furnishings commends it to the most fastidious, as does the deft and rapid service, and the well-cooked menu. The show windows are fitted up after the latest models, with hardwood on which the Vienna's specialties in confectionery are displayed. Original Vienna bread, rolls and wedding cake are famous since the days of '76, when the bakery was first established. The new location is very convenient, and commends itself not only for lunch and dinner, but for ladies on afternoon shopping tours desiring a light refreshment, and for suppers after the theatre.

We regard it as indispensable in our household, and would not be without it for ten times its cost." See advertisement on page 30.

Madame Nordica's Illness

It was with great regret that Messrs. Bouvier and Greenbaum called the Nordica recitals off, but the doctor's orders were imperative. Madame Nordica has the reputation of being the most reliable of all the great singers and in the many years of her connection with the Metropolitan opera company never disappointed an audience. She takes this unfortunate experience very much to heart, and says that when she is perfectly recovered she wants to come back to San Francisco, no matter what her future dates may be, and sing for our people, who have been so kind to her in her illness. Fortunately Madame Nordica's illness is not in any way connected with her vocal organs, but simply severe shock to the nervous system, only requiring absolute rest. The next attraction coming under this management is the Chicago Symphony Orchestra of over fifty artists, under the direction of Mr. Adolph Rosenbecker and assisted by four soloists, Madame Ragna Linne, soprano, Mr. C. Towne, tenor, Jan Van Oordt, violinist, and Franz Wagner, 'cellist. At their four concerts the following symphonies will be played in the order named: Mendelssohn's Scotch, Tschaikowsky's Pathetique, Beethoven's Seventh and Raff's Leonore. The prices will be popular theatre prices.

The Symphony Concert

The opportunity for a great musical treat was lost last Friday when the symphony orchestra played in the Grand Opera House and Josef Hofmann in the Columbia theatre. What a fine combination would the two have made. A divided set of music lovers would have been better satisfied and the Grand would have been packed from pit to dome. As it was, only the family circle and gallery were well filled, the dress circle and orchestra seats holding but a meagre number of hearers to listen to a finely rendered program, beginning with Dvorak's American symphony. I have heard the "New World" played several times, once by the Chicago symphony orchestra, but never better done than on Friday afternoon. The violins were in especially good trim and their bows rose and fell as with one man. Director Steindorff's reading of the symphony varies considerably from those of other leaders, but I think the composer would have been satisfied with it. He brought out the meaning of the largo and scherzo movements so plainly that no one could fail to understand and follow the theme. In the finale one obstreperous horn marred the perfection but that was but a minor blot. The audience was exceedingly enthusiastic and insisted on calling Mr. Steindorff out after the number. The overture from Weber's "Der Freischuetz" was given with fine intelligence and grasp. The odd "Nutcracker" suite of Tschaikowsky, a familiar number but full of surprises, was admirably given. The Arabian and Chinese dances were particularly pleasing to the audience. The danse des mirlitons went with a splendid swing. Lalo's Spanish rhapsody closed the program. The second concert of this series will be given next Friday afternoon at the usual time and place. Schubert's unfinished B minor symphony will be given, with Glinka's overture, "The Life for the Czar," Jadassohn's "Serenade" and Saint-Saens' symphonic poem, "Phaeton." There should be a larger attendance at this concert than at its predecessors, for there will be fewer affairs claiming precedence.

Let the Talkers become Doers

Last week I said that the Symphony Society is not a money-making association, but aims for artistic success and the spread of musical culture. That by no means implies that the society can achieve this result without money. If the concerts are not financial successes they cannot of course be continued indefinitely. The three or four strong purses among the officers and members cannot be expected to shoulder all the expense. The purse of Fortunatus does not exist even in this day of easily acquired millions. But though the subscriptions for the symphony concerts are sufficient to cover the actual outlay, they do not allow for any branching out. If the enterprise becomes popular, and the opera house is crowded or even comfortably filled at every concert, the society could arrange for additions to the programs such as Eastern symphony concerts have—great visiting artists to appear as soloists, etc. What we need is more active interest shown. The people who talk so much about our city's being "jay," and lacking appreciation of true art, are the very ones who, when they have a chance to help on the cause of art, refuse their aid. There is a very devoted band of musical people here, but they cannot do everything to keep interest alive.

Personnel of the Orchestra

There are fifty-five musicians in the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Paul Steindorff, the director, is also musical director at the Tivoli Opera House. Giulio Minetti, the concert master, is one of our best known violinists and the founder and director of the Minetti String Quartet. No one has accomplished more than he in the interests of good music. Year after year, with little financial encouragement, his quartet has given chamber music concerts, the best compositions of the best ancient and modern composers being given. Next to Mr. Minetti, among the first violins, sits Ferdinand Stark, leader of the Zinkand orchestra and a veritable wizard at his instrument. Hother Wismer, another of the first violins, studied in Berlin under the best masters. Edward Lada is leader of the Alcazar orchestra, but does not disdain to sit among the first violins of the symphony orchestra. E. Carlmueller is a violinist who has had service in the Tivoli and other orchestras and with the Minetti quartet. Sam Savannah and H. Siering have also appeared with local quartets giving chamber music recitals. G. Kalthoff and Louis Ritzau appear among the second violins. Charles Heinsen of the Minetti quartet, Bernat Jaulus, leader of the Hungarian orchestra at the Louvre, Conrad Fuhrer and Fred Knell are among the violins. The 'cellests form a strong quintet—P. Friedhofer, F. S. Gutterson, H. Langstroth, F. Mayor and Arthur Weiss. Weiss is one of the finest 'cellists in this part of the world, and when he first came to San Francisco and appeared in concert he was at once taken into favor. Newbauer, Oesterreich and Paulsen are the flutes. Among the horns is E. Schlott, who has few equals on his instrument and who has had experience with many symphony orchestras. It is impossible to make individual mention of an organization containing fifty-five musicians, but sufficient has been said to show what a very good set of players Mr. Steindorff has under his leadership.

The Hofmann Recitals

At the recital to be given on Wednesday night by Josef Hofmann at Metropolitan hall a Chopin concerto will be played by the young pianist accompanied on a second piano by his father, Casimer Hofmann. The other numbers at this recital will be: Variations, D minor, Handel; Rondo G minor, Beethoven; Marche Militaire, Schubert-Tausig; Alceste, Gluck-St. Saens; Gnomenreigen, Liebestraum, Mefisto valse, Liszt. The Marche Militaire was played by Hofmann as an encore at his first concert. The second program, to be given on Saturday afternoon at three o'clock, will be: Praeludium und Fuge D major, Bach-d'Albert; Rondo A moll, Mozart; Marsch aus den Ruinen v. Athen, Beethoven-Rubinstein; Variations serieuses, Mendelssohn; Berceuse, valse A flat major, valse E minor, Chopin; Erl-Konig, Morgenstandchen, Schubert-Liszt; Barcarolle, Robinstein; Rhapsodie, Liszt. Great interest is naturally being taken in these recitals and there is large demand for seats, which are two dollars, one dollar and a half, one dollar, and fifty cents, now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Mr. Louis H. Eaton, organist of Trinity church, has arraged a series of organ recitals, admission to which will be free, and the first of which will be given at the church next Monday evening at eight o'clock. The program will be: Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G major; Cesar Franck's Fantasie in C; Mendelssohn's "Hear Ye, Israel," Miss M. Flynn; Guilmant's First Meditation, op. 20; Schubert's "Great is Jehovah," Mrs. J. E. Birmingham; Charles Marie Widor's Symphonie VI, op. 42, No. 2. Miss Flynn is the soprano of Trinity's choir and Mrs. Birmingham the contralto.

The fifth and last concert of the Minetti string quartet will take place this evening in the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium. The program will be: String quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4, Beethoven; violin sonate A major, Handel; piano quintet, A major, op. 81, Dvorak. Samuel Fleishman will be the pianist of the occasion. Though these concerts are strictly subscription affairs, tickets are to be on sale at the box office for this one as it the last of the series.

Clever Juveniles

The juvenile department of the Von Meyerinck School of Music gave an entertainment last Saturday afternoon before a large and interested audience. The young students, ranging in age from nine to twelve years, rendered a varied program of vocal and piano numbers (solos and duets) and there was an exhibition of physical culture, drill and club-swinging, all gone through with thoroughness and artistic finish. As each of the little students must take up piano, singing and physical culture, it is obvious to see how even at such tender age what good results can be reached with systematic work. The participants were: Hazel Sexton, Parl Giles, Alive Levy, Maud Conley, Wessie Skillen and Herbert von Meyerinck.

The Von Meyerinck School has issued invitations for an entertainment to be given by the members of the dramatic department next Thursday in the recital hall of the school. The program includes excerpts from the opera "Der Freischutz" with Miss Heath and Miss Cullen in the principal parts, assisted by the members of the class in the chorus; an exhibition of fencing by Mrs. B. M. McKay, the teacher of physical culture at the school, and Professor Tronchet, who has kindly consented to assist; and a fancy dance by Miss Agnes Ahkman, one of Signora Matildita's class of students at the school. The opening number will be a cantata for women's voices, "The Horns," by Hofmann, with solos by Miss Maude Fay and Miss Heath. Fred Maurer will be at the piano and Miss Gowan will assist at the organ.

—The Music Critic

A recital will be given by the pupils of Fräulein Lotte Siegel on Friday, February fourteenth, Sherman Clay Hall, and arias and songs by Lassen, Mozart, Grieg and Leoncavallo will be rendered.

FAMOUS FOR ITS LINGERIE

It is worthy of retaining in the recollection that when the stork paid his first visit at the home of the Princess Colonna, he found a trousseau of Californian make awaiting his infant charge's arrival. The Princess' mother, Mrs. John Mackay, would permit her grandchild to wear none but the finest garments to be obtained, therefore she sent to Davis, Schonwasser & Co., of 128-134 Post street, in this city, an order for an expensive baby-trousseau. Those who saw the tiny garments when they reached Paris exclaimed at their beauty, and the fame of the San Francisco firm naturally spread over the world's capital. The name has always been well-known in New York, by reason of the fact that nearly all the great actresses that come this way buy their fine underwear at Davis, Schonwasser & Co's. Just now the firm is having its annual sale of undergarments, the dainty bits of muslin, lace and embroidery being sold at a great reduction from the original prices. Petticoats, drawers, corset-covers and chemises of exquisite make and embellishment are included in the sale.

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff,
vs.
William Henry Weston, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

ALBERT MAHONY, Clerk.
By THOS. F. O'NEIL, Deputy Clerk.

JOHN J. BARRETT, Attorney for Plaintiff,
Parrott Building, San Francisco.

Miss Westgate wrote the following in the Alameda Argus last Saturday: "One recently heard with great pleasure the playing of Mrs. H. H. Sherwood and three talented children, at a small gathering at the Sherwood home. Mrs. Sherwood played lute and Miss Avis mandolin, both being students with Mr. Adelstein. As a somewhat recent convert—and a somewhat unwilling one, too—to the recognition of the value of these instruments for giving out music, the undersigned more than ever enjoys expressing the pleasure received. Master Warner has unusual talent for violin, and has studied well. Miss Mary takes delight in the piano, and has an instinct for accompanying unusual in a child. They have a repertory of unhackneyed compositions, for Mr. Adelstein's Florentine and Venetian music friends keep him supplied with the best things in mandolin literature. Their playing is full of light and shade, and they give a musicianly interpretation of everything they attempt. As a rule, the melodies are given to the mandolin, the violin affords for the most part a viola-like assistance, the lute is a good deal like a 'cello in its effect, and the piano supplies the necessary background. The ensemble work has all been done under Mr. Adelstein's direction."

The Berkeley Oratorio Society and the Berkeley Orchestral Society, twenty instruments, will present Handel's "Messiah" under the direction of Clinton R. Morse, at Shattuck hall in Berkeley on February thirteenth. Miss Grace I. Davis, soprano. Mrs. Lena Carroll-Nicholson, contralto, Mr. Roy Max Smith tenor, Mr. S. Homer Henley bass, and Miss Maud Wellendorff pianist, will assist.

Josef Hofmann will play in Oakland at the Unitarian church next Friday night and will give the same program that was played here last Friday afternoon. Alfred Wilkie is the manager for the Oakland recital, as he was for the one given there on Thursday evening of last week.

Sybil Sanderson and Rose Relda are among the five Americans who have had the honor of singing at the Opera Comique, Paris. An absolutely perfect French accent is required, or what is the same thing, no trace of any other accent is tolerated from singers who appear at the Comique. Fanchon Thompson, Mary Garden and Claude Allbright are the other three Americans and the last two are singing there now. Madame Acte of Belgium is the only other foreigner in the Comique company. —The Music Critic.

A TRANSFORMATION SCENE

How different the Mechanic's Pavilion looks today from its appearance one week ago. Everything is ready for the opening this afternoon of the Carnival of Fairyland, which Manager Buckley has been preparing for weeks past. It is like a transformation scene. The big bare interior is changed so that it is unrecognizable. No former carnival had such a beautiful background as this one will have. The fairyland idea has been charmingly carried out and with the little dancing fairies on the stage the visitor will fancy himself in direct communication with Queen Titania and her subjects. The Pacific Cat Club will have a large showing of high-bred felines, one portion of the Pavilion being allotted to the club. All the booths of the different exhibitors are ranged about the Pavilion and the largest stage ever seen in this city is at the Polk street end. The program for next week is as follows: On Monday the Eintracht pupils will make matters merry; on Tuesday Turn Verein children will give an exhibition; on Wednesday the little fellows who were reviewed by the Governor a few weeks ago will repeat their drill; Thursday will be Baby Show day with a parade in carriages; on Friday there will be a championship juvenile cakewalk, and the battle of confetti. On the closing day—Saturday—the principal features of the week will be repeated. A military band will be heard from a stand in the centre of the building.

THE OLD AND THE NEW

For many years it was the custom of business men to sneer at the work of the business college. They regarded its graduates as mere theorists, useless in practical work. There was, and still is, in many instances, ground for this feeling. As long as the teachers were mere theorists, their pupils could be no better. With the advent of the San Francisco Business College this condition was changed. Its proprietors are men who have spent years in the active practice of book-keeping and shorthand. They brought into their college the training and methods of the business house. The change was immediately apparent. The graduate went forth a trained, accurate, capable accountant or shorthand writer. Business men are satisfied with their work and highly commend the San Francisco Business College.

A shorthand student of this college recently made the phenomenal record of two hundred and six words per minute in shorthand. This high rate is due largely to the speed of the system used—the Gregg, which is undoubtedly the fastest system, as well as the most legible, in use. The college has adopted the novel and very attractive plan of furnishing a typewriter to each pupil in his own home. Nearly three hundred young people are placed in profitable positions each year by this college.

THE POPULAR PURITAN

The proof of a restaurant's prosperity is its popularity. If it is always well filled you may be sure that its proprietor is satisfied with his receipts. The prosperity and popularity of the Puritan, 413 Market street, are founded on fact. This dining-room is popular because its menu consist of pure foods.

The sales of Argonaut "O. K." rye and bourbon prove that this brand is decidedly the most popular on the market. E. Martin & Co., 54-56 First street, are the proprietors.

THE GRAYBEARDS LAMENT.

I wonder where the sylphs have gone
Who once cotillon's halls did grace
With dainty, slender, tapering forms;
They needed not the binding lace—
Lithe as Diana's at the chase.
The wind has whisked them far away,
And buxom dames are in their place.
Where are the sylphs of yesterday?

Rawson, in disgust.—I'm going to quit my boarding-house. The food's getting so thin. I believe the landlady cuts the beef with a carpenter's plane.

Dawson, cheerfully.—That's nothing; up at the boarding-house where I live the landlady shaves the meat with a safety razor.

POPULAR EVERYWHERE.

"No, he foundered it there."

Miss Sourgrape.—The loss of his first wife must have affected his mind.

Her friend.—Why?

Miss Sourgrape.—They say he's going to marry Maude Makeup.

CLEVERLY SIDE-STEPPED.

"I hear your wife won an automobile from you on recount for supervisors. That was a heavy loss."

"Not a bit. I compromised on a lovely automobile coat that out-googoos anything in town."

Henpeck: There goes the bravest woman I ever met.

Frostbite: What did she ever do?

Henpeck: She said. "Nonsense!" once to an argument with my wife.

Amateur Beeler.—The annual repairs on your auto must run up to a high figure.

WILLING TO WORK HER WAY.

Were I a wife,
Upon my life,
No duty would I shirk.
No time I'd lose
In morning snooze,
But hasten to my work.

I'd chop the wood,
As woman should,
What sphere would I wish higher?
I'd grab a match,
Which I would scratch,
And rush and light the fire.

A meal I'd bring,
Fit for a king,
To bed where "hubby's" snoring;
With gentle word
I'd rouse my lord,
And serve, the while adoring.

Then when at eve,
He took his leave,
Of business that so tires,
He'd feel no woes
Because he knows
His wife would "light the fires."

LOVE WILL FIND A WAY.

"Have you heard the news, dear?"
"No."
"Maude is married at last and Love wasn't blind in her case, I'm sure."
"Why?"
"Her husband is an oculist."

He.—Are you superstitious about opals?

She.—Well, I think it's unlucky to lose a chance of getting one.

BOTH AT SCRATCH.

He forced her pa to toe the mark:
'Twas quite a hit.
Alas! her pa did toe the mark
And he was It.

AT THE CLUB.

"Anybody hurt in that scrap Chubley had with Henderson?"

"No; but after they were separated Chubley complained of a gnawing sensation in his stomach. Singular, wasn't it?"

"Not a bit; he must have swallowed his false teeth."

"When did you first get acquainted with your wife?"

"About three months after I married her."

"Jagson's confidence ought to help him along in the world a big lot."

"It would, only it's misplaced."

THE SAME OLD SONG.

Slowboy.—What was in that extra the newsboys were shouting on the street so early this morning?

Brightboy.—Nothing extra.

OUR OPINION

Disgracing the State

The long-drawn-out trial of the Modoc county lynchers will inevitably result in an acquittal or a disagreement of the jury. This has been evident to the most casual readers who have followed the case. It would be hard to say which member of the court is doing most to make a farce of the whole affair. Meantime, the jurors are compelled to neglect their own affairs and the expenses pile up while the unseemly squabble is kept going. If it is a specimen of the way trials are conducted in that part of the State, no better justification for the lynchings could be cited. It is a case in which the prisoners are on trial for their lives, and the process of law should be conducted with at least an outward show of dignity and responsibility. California had some dim hope of emerging from the fog which has enveloped her as a result of Bret Harte's early romancing, but this Modoc county affair will be confirmatory evidence, wherever the report of the farcical trial penetrates, that we are still a community of red-shirted miners and sombreroed cowboys. Unfortunately for us, on the principle that untraveled Europeans believe that the schoolboys of Gotham spend their Saturday afternoons throwing sticks over Niagara Falls, every place in California is only across the bay from San Francisco. It would be a work of supererogation to attempt to explain that Modoc is a frontier community, for to most Easterners the whole State is a frontier. Neither would it be of any use to state that Alturas is further from the bay in a bee line than the width of several of the Atlantic States, nor that it is only a few years ago since that part of the State was given over to a tribe of savage Indians, who gave Uncle Sam's troops a stubborn fight before they were subdued. The State at large will suffer for the shortcomings of this out-of-the-way corner. But if the result is a demand for more dignity in court proceedings and more respect on the part of counsel and spectators, it will be an appreciated blessing.

War on the Comic Valentine

The Woman's club of Ravenswood, a Chicago suburb, has declared war on the comic valentine. Sympathizing club women of Chicago have not only endorsed their sentiments, but are going to support them in the forthcoming campaign. The great annual comic is marked for onslaught because, forsooth, it doesn't live up to its name and reputation: the attacking women's clubs declare that its pictures are not comic, its verses are not funny, and that it is a parody on art with evil and malicious tendencies. Thus the old, old fate that has attacked many a man who tried to be funny is barking at the heels of the comic valentine. Instead of being taken in a jesting spirit it is taken seriously and as the great purveyor of annual nonsense its job is up. The dreadful thing is that both sides are taking the matter in deadly seriousness, for the pursued valentine has its champions. Dr. Frances Dickinson, in an effort to protect its threatened head from the uplifted clubs of the good ladies of the Ravenswood club, says: "Those who can't appreciate the comic valentine seem to me to be lacking in humor, and humor is all that saves us from becoming pessimists. Of one thing I am sure, and that is that comic valentines are less objectionable than sentimental ones. Give me comedy every time.." Do the good ladies of the Ravenswood club want to reduce life to the Puritanical idea of straight-laced "sense in spectacles," or are they unconsciously making of themselves a "comic" for some pencil genius?

Shall Woman do the Proposing?

The Rev. Charles K. Kloss of St. Louis is probably the most surprised and the most abashed man on the continent today. He got his feet into the fire like a great big awkward man by trying to compliment advanced woman. In the fulness of a good heart, and without taking any advice from the ladies, he recently proclaimed from his pulpit that if the gentler sex be allowed to propose marriage the ideal husband would soon become a reality and divorce would soon be out of fashion. Ordinary man would think that such a "bouquet of real sense" would tickle the pride of the stately leaders of the Amazon advance. Far from it. They promptly told Rev. Kloss to go way back and sit down. The reason is not far to seek. Many a brave, happy-go-lucky man who dreamed that he led the marriage procession has later on awakened to the fact that he was artfully pushed to the altar. Most men never wake up and that's why advanced women don't want Dr. Kloss to talk so loud. The tale of many Benedicts is the story of the man who met a girl friend and burst out with this delightful news: "I've got something to surprise you, Prue. I proposed to Nellie today and we're going to be married." "No news at all," Prue replied, "Nellie asked me to be her bridesmaid a month ago." All the intrepid leaders, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Mrs. Charles H. Dennison, president of Sorosis, and Lillie Devereaux Blake take exception to Dr. Kloss' suggestion, though Mrs. Blake is a bit inclined to think that perhaps woman ought to be allowed just a little more leeway in wooing. As befits one of her exalted position Mrs. Stanton suavely points out that no matter what man may think, or say, or do in the "pop question," lovely woman will continue, as she always has done, to decide the whole matter. "Women have done the proposing since the beginning of time," she says. "Of course I don't mean they have ever done so vulgar a thing as to ask men to marry them. They are too intuitive for that ever to be necessary. But there are thousands of ways in which woman's preference and selection of husbands are shown. Did Desdemona openly propose marriage to Othello? Of course not; but she loved and wanted him for a husband and she got him, after a woman's way, didn't she?" Mrs. Blake encourages the diffident and the hesitating among the supposed sterner sex in this fashion: Where the advantages of position are entirely with the woman there is no doubt that it is quite fair for her to give a preferred suitor so much encouragement as shall make it plain that a proposal of marriage will be welcome. Social queens who have much to give may very properly extend to favored admirers some token of their preference. So bide a bit, shy suitor, and, like Othello, and a long list of others, you'll soon learn whether you are to be made a husband. As for the Rev. Charles K. Kloss, what can he do with this rain of replying batteries coming down on his astonished head? He will probably know better next time than to offer advice to advanced woman.

College Athletes Under Investigation

Right at the heels of the concerted movement on the part of Michigan universities to do away with football comes the report of President Eliot for the college year 1900-1901, discussing college athletics and declaring that, contrary to general impression, success on the athletic field is no barometer on college attendance. This is in line with the conclusion arrived at by the Michigan investigators. At a recent meeting of the State Teachers' Association they accordingly voted to recommend that all colleges unite to prevent the game on the grounds that it is physically injurious and has not performed the office which its friends claim for it, namely, that of increasing the attendance. The faculties of nearly all the colleges in the State are now considering the recommendations. President Eliot's inquiry into this much discussed question is exceedingly interesting because Harvard is one of the leading participants in intercollegiate sports. He prints a table covering the period of the past ten years in which the defeat or victory of Harvard and Yale in each form of athletics is set down, together with the size of the Freshman class, its increase or loss in the same year, both in the college department and the scientific schools connected with these universities. In only one year was defeat at Harvard followed by a loss in the Freshman class, and victory for Yale has had no decided effect in increasing the size of its Freshman classes. During the ten years covered the preponderance of victory was in favor of Yale and yet the gain in the size of the Freshman classes was largely on the side of Harvard. The same result holds good in comparing Yale and Princeton though not in so striking a manner. Princeton has made a larger percentage of growth in the ten years notwithstanding the fact that Yale has won more victories in athletics. Summing up, President Eliot says: "If the American colleges and universities could satisfy themselves that success in athletics is not indispensable to college growth, or better still, be persuaded that too much attention to athletic sports, or a bad tone in regard to them, hinders college growth, there would probably be a greater improvement in the spirit in which intercollegiate contests are conducted, they would come to be regarded as the by-play they really are, and would be carried on in a sportsmanlike way as interesting and profitable amusements." College presidents will undoubtedly find much food for thought in these conclusions.

Hero Hobson as a Pensioner

Hero Hobson, having developed political aspirations, has considerately applied to the Naval Board to be retired on three thousand dollars a year in order that he may be eligible to serve the country in Congress. Hobson, of course, does not state his plans in just this way. His application is based on physical disability, for he claims that his eyesight has failed so that he is no longer able to be of use as a constructor. The Retiring Board has not seen fit to agree with him, and now the young gentleman is confronted with the alternative of active service or resigning both salary and commission. In the latter event he will go into politics on the same footing as others who have not enjoyed an education and an appointment from the government. Just now Hobson is something of a problem for the Navy Department; he has the rank of captain and only the experience of a junior constructor. It is therefore difficult to find him occupation suitable to both rank and title. If he is incapacitated there is no reason to continue him in the service against his wish. If, on the other hand, he is suffering to such an extent that he cannot support himself in any civilian employment, there is surely enough patriotism in the country to protest against his entering a home for adult blind and learning the trade of broom-making and basket-weaving. But a strong suspicion is abroad in the land that his case is like that of many other army and navy men—merely entering a career that promises a better chance to make money, and at the same time hold on to a fair competence in case the new venture does not turn out all it promises. The plain, every-day citizen is growing tired of supporting able-bodied pensioners who make no return for the money. No one for a moment grudges the needy veteran the few dollars that are doled out to him in his old age as a scanty return for the service he rendered the country. But there is a growing conviction that the army of pensioners receives recruits altogether out of proportion to the number who saw active service. It is an unquestioned fact that a large part of the drafts on the treasury go to men who are in no need of public assistance. Many of them have private means; many more are well able to support themselves. They apply for pensions simply because pensions can be had so readily with a little influence. They entirely lose sight of the fact that they are virtually posing as paupers and subsisting on public bounty. When men who have been educated at the public expense and employed in the public service at good salaries have the hardihood to make excuses in order to escape rendering value received, and still expect to be compensated, there is no reason to expect that others, less fortunate and less indebted, will stay their hands. At the time the system of government pensions was inaugurated, it was expected that in the course of time the pensioners would pass away and the list grow smaller. Instead of this there has been a steady increase, and now, when the War of the Rebellion is nearly forty years behind us, we have an army of pensioners almost as great as the force in the field. The pension system not only breeds but it is catching. There is a strong feeling amongst the clerks in the various civil departments of the government that they are entitled to a share of the plums; at every session of Congress some effort is made towards providing them with a Fortunatus purse at the conclusion of a certain period. Municipalities have been beguiled into making provision for employes, ex-policemen, ex-firemen and ex-other things, who have not a particle of hesitation about drawing a comfortable salary in private employment, and presenting their warrants to the county treasury in addition. The whole pension business is so charged with fraud and misrepresentation that an honest man hesitates to have anything to do with it. Hero Hobson is neither better nor worse than others. When it is raining porridge, he may as well hold out his dish. The thing to do is to exercise judgment in controlling the rain of porridge, which, under the present system, falls alike on the just and the unjust.

The Saunterer

A Tale of Several Cities

My Salt Lake correspondent writes me that a prominent mining engineer has got himself into an awkward predicament through trying to smuggle a chere amie along on a Russian mining expedition as his wife. The expedition, on behalf of a rich corporation, was to consist of three well-known engineers; each was accorded the privilege of taking along his better-half. The gay engineer was married all right, but for two years he had been maintaining his spouse abroad on the plea of her poor health. She was unknown to the other men so they never questioned the identity of the woman he introduced for the trip as his wife. Quite by accident the secret came out that he had met the woman while on a New York business trip and had become greatly smitten with her charms. Both were married at the time but that proved no bar to their mutual expressions of warm esteem. The Gay Engineer is a man of daring expedients and strong will where his own pleasures are concerned. In addition he has something over half a million dollars to gratify them. He quietly arranged matters so that the woman got a divorce from her husband in Butte; then he brought her West to live. To rearrange his own menage he gave his wife fifty thousand dollars and sent her to Europe to buy dresses and see if she couldn't recover her health. After she had been gone about a year he quietly began suit in San Francisco for a divorce on the ground of desertion. Meanwhile, he set up a handsome establishment here for housing his beautifully attired Thais, and lived quietly so that no hint of the affair should reach the ears of the Eastern mining Croesus whom he represents on this coast.

The Fatal Accident

The Russian mining expedition offered such big returns that he couldn't refuse the chance of going, nor could his daring spirit decline the chance of smuggling along his Lais when the invitation was tendered each member to bring along his wife. In the midst of all this came along the accident that disclosed to true state of affairs. On a visit to Salt Lake he sent the lady to elegant apartments in the leading hotel, while he took rooms at a swell club. One afternoon he visited her and then—well, she was advised to leave the place at once. She blazed her indignation and with flashing eyes declared that Mr. Gay Enginer would demand the reason why his wife was treated in such a manner. Unluckily for her an intimate friend of the real wife heard her claim and at once sent news of the whole affair to Europe. Now the wife is on the eve of returning and creating a disturbance by revealing his business and domestic perfidy. With this expectation he has just put all his property out of his hands so she can't injure his pocket. The truth about the woman who was to pass as his wife has reached the ears of the other members of the Russian trip. In a roundabout way he has been informed of that fact and that he had better resign from the expedition. Now he is on nettles till time shall develop what steps his wife and the Eastern Croesus will take in the affair.

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

Mrs. Carolan's Bete Noir is Gone

The Sanger Pullmans have really bidden good-bye to Blingum. Mrs. Frank Carolan can breathe freely and need no longer drive abroad with fear in her heart that she may be called upon to cut her suster-in-law. Word has flown westward that Sanger and his wife are going to make their home in Bridgeport, Connecticut. Why Bridgeport nobody seems able to figure out, unless the Wests of whom Mrs. Sanger is one have connections there. Connecticut is a conservative State. A Connecticut town is as full of closely drawn social castes as the country of the Hindu. Probably Sanger Pullman has no desire to invade Bridgeport society and if that be the case there is no reason why he should not live as comfortably there as in Chicago or Blingum. Bridgeport is only a short journey from New York, and if the tabbies discuss the Sanger Pullman menage with the venom that the New England tabby usually imparts to her gossip it will be easy to pull up stakes and migrate to the great metropolis which has swallowed unmoved greater newspaper notorieties than the son of Mrs. George Pullman.

Whom Did She Mean?

Perhaps it was the recent hot debate in the California Club over the "color line" that led the president of another woman's club to close her interesting paper on hygiene, the other day, with the following suggestive remarks: "Relax, ladies, if you wish to cultivate elasticity of mind and body. Let go the muscles of your backs, fingers and toes. Surrender your elbows; let them hang loosely. When you hold them tightly they express self-assertion, egotism, self-consciousness. You have no idea what effect the surrender of the tongue and jaw will have upon the voice. It also makes one more amiable. It does everything. If you surrender the jaw you will not like backbiting." And as the ladies filed out to tea they wondered who was meant.

Her Lineage Passes Muster

Word comes to me from New York that Ethel Keeney has won the hearts of the relatives of her husband-to-be, and that everything will in consequence be smooth sailing for her in that quarter. Ethel Keeney has no end of tact and adaptability and as one of her mottoes is "Do in Rome as the Romans do," she never fails to win friends in all classes and castes. The fact that her mother belongs to Sequoia chapter of the Daughters of the Revolution naturally counts for a good deal in exclusive Yonkers, where Mrs. Tomlinson lives and where Miss Keeney is now visiting. The Westchester and adjacent county people pride themselves on their revolutionary ancestry. In New Rochelle and thereabouts they have a society of Sons of Huguenots, and this branch of early colonists is even more set up in its pride than are the Revolutionary Sons and Daughters. Mr. Tomlinson knew what would please his family when he asked Ethel Keeney to be his bride. Of course he was dreadfully in love, as his pursuit of the beauty at Del Monte for two seasons betrayed. But the Keeneys are very nice people to be related to. Mrs. William Alvord, the grandmamma, is a charming woman. Both of her marriages were good ones, socially and financially, first to the U. S. Army surgeon and then to the ex-Mayor of San Francisco. Charles McIntosh Keeney, Ethel's father, is a genial man and a good fellow, his daughter inheriting these qualities from him as she took her sparkling beauty from her mother. Dr. Jim Keeney, Ethel's uncle, also married into a good family, his wife being Miss Jones, a step-daughter of Judge Pratt.

Mrs. Martin in the South

You never know how much you like a person, or how necessary he or she is to your life, until absence makes the loss felt. This is very true of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who was decidedly missed at the final gayeties that marked the coming of Lent. But Mrs. Martin is having a good time in new fields. In Los Angeles last week Mrs. O. W. Childs gave a luncheon in her honor and a few days before the Randolph Miners entertained her at a dinner.

Joined Her Husband in His Faith

When Cora Myerstein married "Billy" Stinson the Myersteins forsook the Talmud for the New Testament. This open defection from the ranks of the "chosen" people to a plush-padded pew in a Christian church has naturally raised a crop of interrogation points. Why? query the Hebrews from their side of the religious fence; and Why? echo the Protestants. There are not a few instances of Jewesses embracing the faith of their Gentile husbands, but for Hebrew parents to adopt such a son-in-law's religion is a reminder of the adage, "Miracles never cease." Several explanations are offered by the gossips, but the Myersteins themselves pursue the even tenor of their new religious way. One version of the affair is that the Myersteins were very wealthy once and were socially above par in Hebrew circles. But when their fortunes fell they found that they were scratched off the lists of the Hebrew social leaders, and they knitted closer the bonds that held them to the few Gentile friends who were faithful in adversity. As drooping fortune began to perk up a bit this circle of Christian acquaintances grew, and when their daughter Cora chose to marry one of this number, the parents decided that they too would forsake the faith of their fathers for the son-in-law's. "Gentiles were their friends in need so they became Christians indeed," is the version in a nutshell.

Smooth Sailing in the Swim

"Nonsense!" cry the opposing camp. "The blood-brotherhood of the Jews is too strong for such a thing to happen." This faction claims that the truth of the matter is that the Myersteins did not want to associate with their co-religionists and that Cora was anxious to carve a niche for herself in the Gentile ton. Her marriage to "Billy" Stinson paved the way and now that her parents have joined a Protestant church, there will be smoother sailing. So the pros and cons weigh the question and the Myersteins alone seem unconcerned in the hubbub of discussion.

Fatal Note Told the Story

When the pot calls the kettle black things always reach a boiling point. Not long ago a fond mamma accidentally overheard that her son is devoted to a young lady who once hung on to the outer fringes of society but was dropped with a sickening thud when—however, that's another story. The fluttered parent confided her fears to her brother who set about to save the youngster from the clutches of Circe. He knew how hard it is to resist "when she does comme ca jusque la." He forgot that "God made wine and the Devil made ink," and he wrote a letter to the charmer telling her that his nephew was private property and to keep off the grass. He referred to their own friendship in the past and suggested that one in a family ought to be enough to feed the flame of her vanity. Now whether the young woman purposely dropped the letter in the path of four society girls, or whether the telltale breezes mischievously blew it their way, history does not tell. But the girls picked it up at the junction of the Sutter and Larkin street cars. As the writer had been paying devoirs that seemed all wool and a yard wide to one of the girls she was naturally a bit surprised to find that he had incense to burn at another's altar—and not an orthodox one. Half the people in the smart set have by this time either heard of or read the fatal missive and there is one wrathy young uncle in town who says his nephew can go to the demnition bow wows by all the short cuts before he'll ever put his pen to paper again to save him.

Cupid Settled It Nicely, After All

Mrs. Laurie Adams of Oakland has been one of the most striking figures at the recent smart receptions on this rim of the bay. It is remarkable how very much Mrs. Adams and Helen Hopkins-Taylor resemble each other. Feature for feature they are not duplicates, but the general make-up of the two women is strikingly similar. Time was when Laurie Adams cooled his heels at the Hopkins door and it was diamonds to doughnuts that she looked kindly on his suit. But then came the rush to the Klondike and Mr. Adams was sent up there on important business. Cupid evidently resented this placing business before courtship and the impudent little fellow got in his deadly work. When Mr. Adams returned from the frozen fields of the far north he found that the Klondike was torrid in comparison to the marble heart handed him by Miss Hopkins. When she married Gus Taylor, Mr. Adams took his heart out of the sling and sent it to Cupid's repair shop where its functions were deftly mended. His marriage to a charming Oakland girl proved the dent was not so deep after all. It was at a tea given the other day that Mrs. Adams and Mrs. Taylor met for the first time. People expected them to touch finger tips and shed icicles but they were frankly cordial and warmed up to each other in surprising fashion. Mrs. Adams just misses Mrs. Taylor's height and she is as pronounced a blonde.

Phoebe Painter a Pretty Bride

Weddings in the First Congregational church necessitate a strain on the witnesses' necks. You have to rubber to catch a glimpse of anything or anybody, not only because the church is such a big barn but because the back pews are shut in, fencelike, by a high railing curtained like a choir-rail. Therefore, there was an immense amount of rubbering at the Painter-Pond wedding on Tuesday night. The church was full, except the galleries, which were closed, but as the reception that followed the ceremony was for the bridal party and relatives only there was no smart dressing among the church guests. The bride looked as pretty as a bride should, but Phoebe Painter could not look otherwise, for she has been pretty all her life. Her sister Lizzie, the maid of honor, is the image of her aunt, Mrs. Yemans, when the latter was Kittie Staples. The bridegroom's father, Rev. W. C. Pond, assisted the pastor of the church, Rev. Dr. Adams, in the ceremony.

Senator Perkins' Start in Life

Here is a story that has been started on a course through the East to show that our Senator Perkins is in the same class as Carnegie, Hill and Field when it comes to energy, pluck and enterprise. According to the biographer, Perkins struck out for California from his home in Maine when he was only twelve years old. In the gold regions he got a job as errand boy in a grocery store at thirty dollars a month and board. His earnings were carefully laid away till such opportunity should occur for their safe investment, and then he had an eight hundred dollar bank account. One day the man who owned the ferry across a near-by stream ran his boat aground. After exhausting his patience to get her off he gave out that he was tired of the business and would sell out cheap for cash. Young Perkins was quick to see his chance. "How much?" he asked. "One thousand dollars, and not a cent less," was the reply. The lad agreed to furnish that price before sundown. He drew his money from the bank, and then canvassed the town to raise the two hundred dollars balance. He went to every business man with whom he had a speaking acquaintance and raised everything in the shape of money he could. The largest sum he got from one person was forty dollars; the lowest was a quarter, and he was glad to get it, for every penny swelled his pile. When sundown came he turned over the money and the boat was his. But for a long time his new investment was nonproductive. It took him three months to cut away the sandbar, for he had to do all the work himself. But he never lost heart, and his faith and energy were amply rewarded when, after running the ferry a few months, he sold out for three thousand dollars.

Spreading of the Crocker Clan

Though the C. B. Alexanders are not coming to California this year but will go to Egypt instead, the Sloat Fassetts and Mrs. George Crocker will make a very good-sized Crocker contingent added to the local branches. Mrs. Sloat Fassett is the elder daughter of the late Mrs. Margaret Crocker and though her visits to California have been few and far between she cherishes kindly feelings for her old home in Sacramento and for those of her girlhood's friends who survive. She has a lovely home in Elmira and is devoted to her brilliant husband. What a host of Crockers there are, by the way! Of the E. B. branch there still remain Mrs. Fassett and Mrs. Ashe-Gillig-Gouraud, with their children. Then there is Will Crocker, and through his wife's connection the Princess Poniatowski may properly be counted in, for the sisters in spite of their occasional differences are very fond of each other. There is no chance of the Will Crocker branch's dying out. Mrs. George Crocker's dot included the children of her former husband, and George regards them with true fatherly affection. The late Colonel Fred Crocker's branch is hale and strong. Templeton will probably recover from his unfortunate accident. Mary, Mrs. Scott, is the picture of health, as is her sister Jennie. Mrs. Alexander belongs with George and Will to the Charles Crocker branch. Then comes the Clark branch—Henry, the eldest, with an array of handsome, healthy olive branches; Fannie, Mrs. McCreary of Sacramento; Julia, Mrs. Sam Buckbee. There is still another set of Crockers—the Henry branch, which has a son Charles. Some time the Crocker clans should hold a grand reunion. The old home built by Charles Crocker on Nob Hill would be the proper place to hold such a gathering.

His Name will Create a Stir

Like all the big Expositions, the forthcoming Coronation in London is going to have an immense variety of great side attractions. The last drawing card the English papers have picked up to discuss is "Hwfa Mon," the Archdruid of Wales. "Hwfa" is nearly eighty years old and resides in Wagolten. Some ten years ago he succeeded as Archdruid the late "Clwydfardd," who lived to be ninety. "Hwfa" is always a great figure at the national Eisteddfodan. "Hwfa" is a fine figure of a man, being very tall and commanding, with white hair descending to his shoulders. It is probable he will wear his official robes at the Coronation ceremony, and if he does his appearance will no doubt create something like a stir. The robes are of pure white, with gold breastplate and wreath of oak leaves.

Addie Murphy in the Hands of Conspirators

Pretty Addie Murphy, there are no more at home like you! Fancy any other girl but her in the smart set openly acknowledging that she was engaged to a man at the time he married another woman. Such a condition would cause most girls to suffer either from a pain in the temper or vanity. But Addie Murphy did neither. She took it as a great joke and still has hold-over ha! ha's to enliven the subject with. Several gay friends who called on her the day after her arrival home determined to use Machiavellian methods and get at the truth of the Robinson-Reilly entanglement. They laid their plans with keen artifice and commenced to yank the wires immediately after warmly greeting her. "You're all very clever, and about as transparent as the window pane," interrupted Addie, "don't waste any fine work on me because I'll tell you all about it without coaxing." Forthwith she proceeded to relate incidents of the long days and starlit nights on board the steamer, with Robinson Reilly dangling over steamer chairs or promenading the deck. "But Genevieve didn't play leading lady to his fetching attitudes," she explained, "I had the centre of the stage myself."

Rescued by Dear Genevieve

Then Miss Murphy laughingly confessed that she really did become engaged to Mr. Reilly in London. "It's either mal de mer or ennui on shipboard, unless you can work yourself up to a flirtation and I managed to do it. So when we got to town an engagement was the only artistic finish to the affair. Dear mamma, she kept the cables jumping with Washington messages about Mr. Reilly and all of us were in a deliciously lovely state of excitement. Can't you guess mamma's temperature?" Poor Mrs. Murphy! she must have breathed happier when Genevieve "went and did it" instead of her own darling. "I never cared much about him," admitted Addie, "and I had about as much intention of marrying him as I have of taking a short cut to heaven. But the engagement helped passer le temps. The thing was getting to be somewhat of a bore, though, when dear Genevieve, like the brick she is, took him off my hands."

Won at Last by "Bunko Bill"

The Siebert affair Miss Murphy does not discuss so airily. When her father's train pulled into Washington, Addie was sorrowfully taken into his arms and with choking voice and a sprinkle of tears, he said, "Is my other girlie going to desert her old father, too?" Actor Stoddart himself could have taken pointers on the pathetic father act. It worked like a charm. Impulsive Addie declared that she'd marry no one if dear old "Bunko Bill"—a pet name for her father—was going to take it so hard. She promised to break her engagement at once and come to the lovely house the Murphys have built. Mr. Murphy has as much trouble wedding his daughter to single bliss as most parents have in marrying theirs off.

Wooed Two Heiresses at Once

The tabbies in the Oakland set are just now having a delectable time discussing the surprising way in which the engagement of a very well known Oakland belle and a young man living on this side of the bay was terminated. This captivating young Orpheus is good looking, venturesome and would be called cheeky if he had not learned to curb the betrayal of his desires. He returned from Paris a short time ago, whither he went to cultivate his musical aspirations. His father holds a respensible position in one of the biggest down town wholesale stores. The genius of the son is looked upon as the talisman that will lift the family above all this. Certainly if his talent for cultivating the attention of marriageable heiresses continues as it has begun he will realize some of the fondest dreams of the hopeful relatives. It was on his way home from Paris that this young Orpheus met the Chicago heiress and began coquetting with gilt-adorned hearts. When he arrived here he resumed his acquaintance of the Oakland belle and it wasn't long before their friends knew that everything had been settled except the naming of the wedding day.

DR. PARKER'S COUGH CURE

Choice of the Perfidious Orpheus

The first inkling the Oakland belle had that she was not the bona fide Eurydice of this Orpheus was when she picked up an evening paper last week and was stunned to read the notice of his engagement and approaching marriage with the Chicago heiress. The heiress, by the by, arrived here several weeks ago preparatory to the wedding. Up to the date of her arrival the swan-like swain, instead of humming his own death song, as most men would have done on the eve of such a meeting of heart claimants, continued to troll his gay love lay to the enraptured Oakland belle. He must have completely hypnotized her for he borrowed a snug little sum of money of her. At least she says so since she has waked up and learned of his perfidy. She can afford the entertainment however for her father is one of the richest and most influential men in Oakland. As for the pursued Orpheus he doesn't sing the famous gem from the Beggars' opera—

"How happy could I be with either
Were t'other dear charmer away."

For rich as the Oakland belle is her Chicago rival is the richer and the student from Paris frankly avows his heart's choice is with Chicago, as per the announcement of the wedding set for the middle of March. Meanwhile the Oakland belle is receiving the sympathy of her friends over "her lucky escape."

Cherishes Stage Aspirations, But—

Vesta Shortridge, the only daughter of Charles Shortridge, is thinking of going upon the stage. She has already made a success in amateur theatricals and this gives her much encouragement. She will not be the only one of Shortridge blood to nourish Thespian ambitions. The three daughters of Mrs. Clara Foltz went on the stage and one of them is now acting in a New York theatre. Trella, the eldest, who went on the stage after the death of her husband, young Dr. Toland, was leading lady in a company before she married a New York man and retired. Vesta is very attractive and would be a hit on the stage judging by her popularity in society. I have a suspcion that Emil Bruguiere may prevent her becoming an actress for he has been devotion itself for several months, and friends of both expect an interesting announcement.

Surprised at the Engagement

Every one is very much surprised over the engagement of Miss Eels and Conrad Babcock for the reason that he is one of the young army officers who were supposed to be ready to espouse only a dot. For a long time he was devoted to Mary Scott Martin. Then she married Walter. Miss Eels has no money and it is purely a love match. It is generally thought that Mr. Eels is an Englishman but he is an American. Mrs. Eels was Miss Shephard of Oakland. Both the Babcocks and the Eels' are very happy over the engagement, for they feel that it is a nice safe match.

One of Ralph Strong's Stories

Ralph Strong, who died last week in Los Angeles from the effects of an operation on his ear, at one time worked on the now defunct Daily Report in this city. At one time he worked in Southern California. He was a clever youth and fond of a joke. One he told had himself, Governor Gage and Dion O'Leary, who married Alice Rix, as the principals. Strong had to see Gage in Los Angeles for his paper, and as he explained that his hearing was poor the Governor raised his voice in speaking to him. Not long after this O'Leary waylaid the Governor on his way to San Francisco, and Gage mistaking him for Strong conversed with him in tones audible several feet away from his carriage. O'Leary stood it for awhile and then the Governor's reason for using such stentorian tones dawned upon him. Mastering his natural hesitation of speech by a supreme effort, he said "Beg p-p-pardon, G-g-overnor. You have m-m-made a m-m-mistake. I'm not the f-f-fellow who c-c-can't hear. I'm the one that c-c-can't talk."

Off the Corean Reservation

Prince Huiwha Jin Jshaper, third son of the King of Corea, is at the Corean Legation in Washington, waiting for the thirty thousand dollars from home to get him out of pawn for his debts. His father gave him an allowance of four thousand dollars a year, and sent him to this country to attend Roanoke University. The twenty-year-old lad staid long enough to learn the customs of the country and then made a trip to see the sights of Coney Island. When he awoke from his dream, several days later, he found that the money-lenders and ladies of Coney Island had mortgages on most of his castles in Corea. Not only had he spent all his money, but he had given them his notes, at high rates of interest, for over thirty thousand dollars. The Corean Legation is now trying to straighten out the affair.

Pink silk tights
And all such sights,
With their woozy little whee!

Are as sharp as in Corea,
And more high-priced in their fee.

Turn and haunt the halls of learning;
Set the midnight oil to burning.
In the founts of Roanoke
Is your chance to go an' soak
To the chin for a decree.

Startled some of the Spectators

The surprise at the Mardi Gras ball was the appearance together of Mr. and Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs, and in the same box, too. People could hardly believe their eyes but this noble and self-sacrificing act on their part quelled rumors. It was like Wilhelmina and her prince consort appearing together in a carriage. Mrs. Oelrichs looked tired and her big tiara was enough to weary anyone with its weight. In New York, which is so closely in touch with London, every other woman wears a tiara, but here bows of ribbon and roses are extravagance and so Mrs. Oelrichs' tiara was the most conspicuous thing at the ball—after Hermann.

Peace Perches Over Club

Mrs. Lovell White has withdrawn her resignation and returned to her position in the California club and things are running as lovely as if nothing had happened. The credit of this happy deliverance is given to Mrs. E. L. Campbell, Mrs. W. S. Leake and Mrs. Thomas Magee, Sr., the committee appointed by the executive board to try and settle all the bitter feelings dividing the club. The prospects look as lovely as a springtime morning. Mrs. White is going to preside, as usual, at the club meeting next Monday morning, the past will be entirely ignored and the re-united members will buckle down to the task of discussing the details of their new dovecote, that is the proposed new club house in Clay street. The lot will cost them ten thousand dollars. They have already paid one thousand dollars deposit. Mrs. George Law Smith and a committee have been working like troopers to raise the balance and have already succeeded in getting something like seven thousand dollars promised. So the prospects of paying for the lot are excellent. Afterwards the property will be bonded and in this wise funds will be raised to erect the building.

Will she run for the Presidency?

What may prove a very lively number on the program of Monday's meeting is the appointment of a committee to nominate the officers of the club for the ensuing year. The interesting question is: After what has transpired will Mrs. White run again for the presidency? Will her friends demand a vindication for her? It's a nice question just at this juncture. Mrs. White herself says she will not be a candidate again. She has held the office for four years. The candidate most talked of for the position is Mrs. J. W. Orr, the present Corresponding Secretary of the State Federation of Women's Clubs. The club election will be held earlier than usual this year on account of the date set for the gathering of the State Federation in Los Angeles next month. Mrs. White, by virtue of her office, will be the club's delegate to that convention.

Passing of Mrs. de Guigne

In the midst of the Mardi Gras gayeties thoughts turned toward the Parrott home, so sadly bereaved in the death of Mrs. Christian de Guigne, the eldest daughter. Marie Christine de Guigne, the eldest of the three children now left without a mother, had only a slight taste of society's pleasures when her cousins, the Parrott girls, came out. Her mother's illness was one of long standing though the end came rather more suddenly than was expected. Those who knew the De Guignes well enough to be entertained by them remember what a delightful way Mrs. de Guigne had of making her guests at home. It was only a year or so ago that the Parrott house in Sutter street was the scene of a most elaborate ball at which Mrs. de Guigne was hostess. The Winthrop Lesters and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis are the only ones here who entertain in that broad, cordial, truly hospitable manner that bespeaks the hostess to the manner born.

John Parrott's Hobbies

"Capitalist and dilettante, musician and composer," one of the papers dubbed John Parrott, referring to him among the other relatives of Mrs. de Guigne. Why not have mentioned "and equine enthusiast"? Surely it is not forgotten that Jack Parrott's hackney farm was, when he first conceived it, as great a delight to him as his money-bags, his pictures, his charming songs and bits of melody, his prize violets and chrysanthemums. Why, Jack Parrott paid ten thousand dollars to George Green for Rufus, whose sire was Champion Rufus, to lead his hackney stud. He also bought from Mr. Fairfax, at the same time, Lady Levina, for which mare he gave two thousand five hundred dollars, and Alberto and Alanda which cost him one thousand apiece. This was not so many years ago and the New Yorkers who sold Parrott the prize animals still remember his purchases. The hackneys were exhibited in the first local horse show, which was the joint hobby of Henry Crocker and John Parrott, and which brought little to them or to the other gentlemen who backed it except glory. San Francisco was not then educated to a horse show.

Still harping on Danforth

A few weeks ago the rumor of Miss Salisbury's engagement to Mr. Baldwin was published. Now comes another rumor, for Dame Gossip is determined to marry this young lady off although she is but twenty-one. Danforth Boardman is the fortunate man this time and the announcement seems authentic. They are seen a great deal together and their names are constantly coupled. Danforth Boardman is the brother of Sam Boardman who is so popular in society and one of the best partis. Mrs. George Boardman is a leader of the smart set. Danforth Boardman is extremely clever, and has a business of his own. Some day he will have about a hundred thousand dollars from his mother. His brother Chauncey married Miss Salisbury's cousin, Miss Mercado.

"Rush" and "Crush" at the Mardi Gras

The Mardi Gras was as tame as Algy's lions. Several of the men had evidently tried to fizz up to the carnival spirit, but they only managed to prove that stupidity is the one natural gift which can not be cultivated. Things limped along on crutches till midnight and then livened up for a brief bit, only to relapse again. The tyro in chemistry knows that oil and water will not mix but the managers of the Mardi Gras attempt to mix those born with 24-carat spoons, and those born spoonless, and the cross does'nt make anything better then a soup ladle. At no time during the night was the affair as lively as a wake. All the confetti that Rome ever scattered would not leaven a carnival unless the heart beats with the hand that throws it. To meander through the rooms and throw confetti with about as much spirit and abandon as a peasant sows seed, is not mirth productive. This Mardi Gras will certainly have to go down on the social menu as a fat, sloppy dumpling—too large to be treated like a retiring noodle, too soggy for a swagger oyster patti. The decorations were pretty, the music was excellent, the costumes were indifferent and the supper was different—from all that a good supper should be. The society people sniffed at the viands set before them and even the "barbarians" did not make a square meal. When supper was announced there was the usual rush—even a worse crush than crowds the free lunch counters during hard times—but when the word came out to those unable to squeeze in with the first onslaught that the supper was poor, there was no more scrambling.

Had Their Suppers Elsewhere

Some of the people who got the tip in time, drove down to the Palace Grill and supped there. The Joe Tobins, Kate Clement, the Walter Magees and several others took this course. As there were several large dinners that lasted until ten given before the ball, one might have supposed that people could stay the pangs of hunger with the dishes offered at the Mardi Gras. But Society evidently has an appetite that nightingales' tonges and truffles does not satisfy. What the supper lacked in goodies was made up at the smart private dinners given before the ball. At the Byrne dinner the older set were conspicuous and the Joe Tobin dinner was made up of the hunting set at Burlingame, the Carolans, McCreerys, Tom Magees and Poniatowskis.

Reason the Waiters were Indignant

The waiters who served the supper and champagne held an indignation meeting in the wee sma' hours and consigned San Francisco's society to a place south of the Tehachapi. It seems that the waiters, instead of receiving any wages for their work, paid from two dollars to five dollars for the privilege of being there. Not that the gentlemen of the napkins and trays are anxious to see the smart set en masque, but because they expected to make twenty or thirty dollars each on tips, as they did last year. This year, however, there was not the same liberality displayed and several of the waiters complained that they had not evened up on the sum paid for their jobs. There was not much champagne imbibed, and it is the wine bibbers who give most generously to the servants.

Sportive belles in gay gowns and in beauty,
Scattered frivols at Tuesday night's ball;
Mild matrons with husbands on duty
Wafted looks—to the frames on the wall:
But my own heart was blue as the devil,
While I grieved in a corner alone;
How could I be keen for the revel?
I saw nothing but Maude's chaperon.

"Devils" in Private Dressing Rooms

It was grumblingly noted that the management handled the band of "devils" with silk gloves. They arrived in a bunch and were immediately assigned a separate dressing room. This distinction tagged them at once as elite but such skimming of cream and milk was unusual. Just why a dozen girls should be allowed to spread over a big private room while the rest of the women were forced to elbow en masse is not very clear. The identity of the "devils" furnishes one clue to the preferences. Such an aggregation as the Hopkins girls, Flora Dean-Magee, Caro Crockett-Scott, Bertha Dolbeer, Edith McBean and Alice Hager would naturally feel entitled to privileges. It is said that Mr. Byrne himself offered them a private dressing room on the ground that as Aunt Jemimas they had enlivened the previous revel and deserved it. But the personnel of the "Aunt Jemima" jovials was not exactly that of the "devils." The Aunt Jemimas cut far better capers—in fact, the "devils" were not real devilish. The only time they approached impishness was when one of their number slipped in the dance and was ungallantly deserted by her partner who caused the fall. The devil-ess moaned pitifully and gasped that her ankle was broken. Immediately she was surrounded by her horned sisters who cried for help. Several anxious men rushed to lift the half-fainting girl and carefully bore her toward a dressing room. "See whether there is a doctor here," cried one man; another started off to scurry up smellingsalts, while a third hurried for cold water. But no sooner was the half-fainting girl laid on a couch than she jumped up and with a saucy moue pirouetted away, twinkling two openwork ankles in full repair. "Sold!" chorused the rest of the "devils."

Gay Times promised by the Artists

There was more than the usual number of tickets sold and the venture proved so profitable that the chances are all in favor of the Association's giving another ball next year. The artists, however, are anxious to get in their innings and score on Society. If they succeed in carrying out their plans there will be a procession through the streets with floats such as they have in Paris and in New Orleans: everybody will be masked and strenuous efforts will be made to have the carnival spirit rampant.

The Ruffles were Not His Wife's

The Folger ball really had more of the tang that goes with masks than the Mardi Gras. One of the figures was danced in mask and domino and merriment reached the high water mark. All the disguises being alike it was impossible to tell one person from another, and there were some very amusing mix-ups. One girl insisted that a youth was her brother and wagered a kiss. Of course she was very much embarrassed when his identity was cleared. It is not positively known whether she discounted the bill by paying cash that night or whether he is waiting to demand interest. However, there were plenty of cosy corners in the room, so there was really no excuse for not collecting his wager on the spot. It's a wise husband that knows his own wife, as many of the benedicts found, to their chagrin. One mistaken husband would not be convinced until his partner flirted the skirt of her ball gown and betrayed foamy ruffles of white lace. As "wifey's" petticoats are always coquettish with pink bows he had to look elsewhere.

Wails for Lost Favors

When the music hushed, there was a scramble to collect the beautiful favors and from all sides came wails, "I can't find my hat," or "My wings and muff are gone." Only those who stuck to their favors closer than library paste went home with any. Some of the lighter-fingered ones must have annexed half a dozen of each, judging from the disgruntled ones who had to leave favorless. The supper the Folgers gave their guests made most of the other spreads of the season taste like ordinary fare. There was everything that gourmet could conjure up, and more than could be comfortably tucked away. Champagne was there by the case, and the glasses were always "with beaded bubbles winking at the brim." The two Greenway cotillons were fine, but then they were subscription. So there is really no affair that can be backed for "place" with the Folger ball so far in the lead. Money had greased the mechanical end of it—the decorations, music, favors and supper were lavish, and the guests saw that nothing had been spared to fill their cup of enjoyment to the brim. "The time of my life" is the praise every one bestows on the ball.

Will Try His Luck in Waikiki

Fred Greenwood will not go as far as Japan, after all, in pursuit of his will o' the wisp. Miss Dillon is going to visit the McGrews in Honolulu and "Freddie" who had also planned to stay over at the islands, can ask the same old question on the moonlit beaches at Waikiki, where, when the golden moon is roundest, they drink Kipling's toast—

"To the cool of our deep verandas,
To the crest of our jeweled main,
To the night, to the music,
And the fireflies in the cane."

If the moon and the palm fringed gardens do not move Miss Dillon into the yielding mood there are still the Kahunas who ought to be able to work the charm. These Hawaiian "witch doctors" are said to know the secrets of love potions that knock spots out of the hocus pocus recipes of our medicine-men—and hoodoos. If Mr. Greenwood finds a love-philter in Hawaii it is to be hoped that he will bring some of it back with him. A few drops sprayed on some of the married couples in the smart set would not be amiss.

Cupid on Their Trail

The gossip who keeps the tail of her eye turned on couples who seem to gravitate toward the altar, is furtively watching Mr. Duperu and the daughter of one of the prominent families in the "railroad" set. There are all the signs and signals that hint of a coming engagement and people are keen for the climax. As the girl is a debutante and Mr. Duperu has never before threatened to stray out of bachelordom the affair is exciting unusual interest.

Dr. Yemans in Manila

Somebody was asking at the Painter-Pond wedding, the other night, what had become of Dr. Yemans, the former husband of the bride's aunt and guardian. Since he was last heard of in Dawson City, about three years ago, no one knew whence he had drifted. Now an occasional correspondent writes me from Manila that one of the most popular physicians there is Dr. Herbert W. Yemans, the very man inquired about. It is a long trip from the frozen north to the Philippine Islands but the move appears to have been a good one. Dr. Yemans has been appointed police surgeon in Manila, but he by no means confines himself to his police duties. "He is making a name for himself," writes my correspondent, "as a specialist in skin diseases and is forging ahead in the world of science." There are still many who remember him when he was city physician and police surgeon here. Before that he was in the U. S. A. and was stationed at different times in Portland, Or., Sitka, San Diego and Galveston. After he resigned from the army he took up private practice as his wife preferred to live in San Francisco near her parents. But Dr. Yemans' irregular habits lost him his official position and finally led to a divorce. It appears that the doctor has sowed his wild oats now and will do credit to the fine training he received in early life. He is a graduate of the Detroit, Mich., Medical College and a post graduate of Strasburg University in Germany.

"They say Jenkins made his pile of money following the horses."

"I didn't know he played the races."

"He didn't; he was a stage-driver."

Stockton Ministers Correcting Society

My Stockton correspondent writes:

Church circles here are tinted just now with the paler shades of sensational yellow journalism. The divorce suit of the Rev. J. T. Bryan, following his voluntary resignation of the pastorate of St. John's Episcopal church, where he was well liked, fell like a bomb among us. The rector's ill-health was the reason advanced for leaving his fashionable parish; but it is clear now that the contemplated divorce suit was back of the resignation. As usual, sympathy is about evenly divided among those who knew the least of the Bryans, some claiming that a man so scholarly could not be a very agreeable husband, while others claim to know that Mrs. Bryan had a lively temper. Mr. Bryan's late parishioners keep a discreet silence on the subject, as become good Episcopalians. Indeed, their example is commended to the Bryans.

Things were moving along as usual in Dr. Evans' church until last Sunday, when the reverend gentleman took the centre of the stage and created a sensation by demanding that his salary be paid. He took pains to show that folks that don't pay up go to a warmer place than Stockton some day. But the notion is growing that Dr. Evans likes a sensation. He is the one who dubbed the other Stockton ministers "two by fours." I fancy his pulpit is a pretty hot box because a part of the congregation is decidedly opposed to him.

After the Giddy Teachers

But these things are nothing as compared with the moral crusade which threatens to move upon Stockton's social circles under guidance of the Ministerial Union. The first guns have been fired in the effort to have the school authorities suppress fraternities, sororities, balls, banquets, card parties, etc., among pupils who attend the High school. The school people will probably claim that their authority does not extend to the pupils after they go home. Following these preliminaries a little ministerial hot shot has been fired about the heads of the hard-working teachers because, at one of their socials, they livened up the gloom by dancing. This disposes of the question of whether dancing is wicked in itself or only when indulged with one of the opposite sex, for it is known that there are never half men enough to go around at these teachers' parties and the women have to dance together or miss the mazy waltz and the seductive two-step. Apparently it is clear to the ministerial mind that teachers who indulge in such wild dissipation are not qualified to properly influence the young minds. The teachers ought to play "Krokinole." It is expected that the ministerial crusade will next attack the society women's card clubs. It is known that after-theatre suppers by parents of children are also under the ministerial ban.

Repetition of a Famous Stage Jealousy

The recent extraordinary reception in Rome accorded to the great actress Adelaide Ristori, on attaining her eightieth birthday, calls to mind that the number of famous ones who delighted the world a generation ago is very rapidly lessening. In her day Ristori was regarded as one of the world's greatest actresses. Her tours were veritable stage triumphs. In Paris she enjoyed as great a success as in London, but she roused the jealousy of her magnificent contemporary, Rachel. Ristori, on her arrival in the French capital, wished to place herself under the protection of Rachel, but the latter was out of town. One night, as Ristori was playing "Mirra," she was told that the great French actress had entered the house with Prince Jerome Bonaparte. Accordingly, she put forth all her energies, and the audience was swept off its feet by her wonderful art. During the fourth act Rachel rose impetuously from her seat, tore up her libretto, and left the theatre in a rage. A few days later Ristori received a message that Mme. Rachel would receive her at home with pleasure. The invitation was heartily accepted. A few nights later Rachel sent Ristori a box when she was playing "Fedra," and there the threatened enmity ended. Recently there has been a repetition of this situation between two great actresses representing the same countries; but how different was the attitude of Sarah Bernhardt towards Eleanor Duse.

Testing an Old Criminal Theory

The efforts to catch the brutal culprit in the Nora Fuller case reminds me of a story that ex-Chief of Police Crowley used to tell of a similar case that happened in the early days of the city. The body of the child was found among the rocks under one of the wharves. Not the faintest clue was there anywhere about to give an inkling of the perpetrator of the deed. The whole city was aroused by the dreadful occurrence and spurred the police with appeals and rewards to run the villain down. Days slipped by and nothing transpired to furnish even a hint of the identity or whereabouts of the culprit. One afternoon the Chief was greatly impressed with the idea to test an old theory that has been very much discussed by criminologists: that is that such offenders, in gloating over their base acts, have an uncontrollable desire to return to the scene of their crimes, and live over the details again. Accordingly a watch was set under the wharf and on the second day the criminal was caught. The police had all they could do to save him from the mob.

Beauty Culture from Famous View Points

In the everlasting wrangles among so-called beauty doctors over the virtues of their various lotions, creams and balms, it is refreshing to get the beauty culture opinions of well known artists who really do keep their good looks. It seems rather singular that in spite of the wear and tear of an intensely busy life, late hours, irregular and hurried meals, the actresses and most other women who have to live in the thick of a worldly world remain much younger in appearance than the quiet, reposeful and methodical matrons who sit quietly in their comfortable armchairs, go to bed at ten and have nothing to do between meals. From the replies of famous actresses it seems that "what is medicine for one is poison for another" and that every woman must use her best judgment in ministering to her own particular complexion wants.

Madame Patti's Idea

Madame Patti explained her idea of the best beauty culture in reciting her own experience: "I observe great abstemiousness and find courage enough to drink nothing but milk and water. I always sleep eight hours out of the twenty-four and I never shut the windows of my bedroom, being careful, however, to remain away from the draft. I take daily, quick and hot baths, and only wash my face and neck once a week with tepid water and soap; this always at night, mind, as I should never care to let the wind play on a recently washed skin. On the other days I use plenty of rose water, and dab my face thoroughly with a ball of cotton wool."

Sarah Bernhardt's Confession

In her turn Sarah Bernhardt says: "I should be a perfect fright now, with a face like the back of a crocodile, if I followed Madame Patti's hygiene. I do not want air at all. On the contrary, I like to be preserved from all kinds of slight drafts. I go to bed at three a. m. and get up at nine. I eat plenty of fish and absorb eggs by the dozen—ten a day, very often. I drink champagne—not sparingly. Then I drive to my theatre, where I generally spend twelve hours a day without seeing the light of day. True, I go every summer to my home on Belle Isle-on-Sea to renew my vitality, but even then I seldom go about without having my face well muffled up, as I am always in danger of having my skin crack and chip. And now, hurry, bustle, excitement, nervous exhaustion and constant india rubber ball performances are what my life is composed of, and all this does not kill me or age me—on the contrary. If I were to remain one week in complete peace and quietness my muscles would relax at once, and show to myself and my friends that I am a chicken no longer—a fact which we all easily forget."

Madame Jane Hading says her hygiene is fresh air and traveling. "I repose every day in my big, open-air garden. After that what keeps me young is traveling. To sit down in a railway carriage or in my steamer chair on a vessel, having nothing else to do but to be taken where I want to go, nobody to order about, but to surrender my sceptre and follow suit, means for me a complete course of rejuvenation, and I always arrive at my destination as fresh as a rose. A woman, to keep young, must travel at least six months in the year, and then the year will not mean for her more than six months."

Why They Believe in Exclusion

Anent the Chinese Exclusion bill a correspondent sends me this story, as having happened in the family of P. B. Cornwall. Mr. Cornwall told it himself, as a good joke on the gullibility of his household. The Cornwalls had a Chinese servant who had been with them for years and was the personification of all the virtues. He was meek and submissive, tractable, thrifty, neat, economical, a good cook and general servant, and above all, things honest. John announced that he had made enough to retire on and was going home to end his days in his own country. The family was near to heart-broken at the contemplated departure. But nothing would change the cook's mind, so they had to accept the inevitable. When the final day arrived, he wanted to prepare a specially fine luncheon as a parting gift to the household. Of course they accepted his offer. They were afraid lest his devotion to their comfort would make him lose his steamer, but he said he had everything fixed. His baggage had gone ahead and in just bare time to get to the Mail wharf a hack called for John and he went off amidst a shower of blessings, with only a small parcel in his hand. An hour later, a member of the family went upstairs and noticed that some small article of value was missing from its place. This led to an investigation. It was discovered that every bit of jewelry had departed to the Orient, and a good part of the table silver had gone with it. The steamer was too far out to catch him.

Didn't Like the Sauce

This story reminds me of another that I heard the other day of how the late Judge Hastings, the father of Mrs. John A. Darling, became converted to the Chinese exclusion doctrine. The Hastings' had a Chinese cook who had been with them for years and whom the Judge considered the equal of any Parisian chef. He could serve a state dinner to perfection and was capable of everything from decorating the board to serving the black coffee. One day a holiday dinner was under way and it so happened that the Judge went into the butler's pantry unexpectedly. There he, himself unobserved, saw the Chinese chef putting the finishing touches to the plum pudding. He was doing this in his own way, the same way the Chinese washerman sprinkles the clothes. He had the brandy in his mouth, and blew it over the pudding. The Judge said nothing then, but as he withdrew his wrath was simmering. The dinner was served and the guests enjoyed a succession of dainty dishes. But when the pudding, decorated with holly, came on—"Don't touch a morsel of it," roared the Judge, "take it away!" The beautiful pudding was removed, and later the Judge explained why. After that the family believed in exclusion for Chinese—cooks.

Noted Beauties Uisit Us

Two strikingly beautiful women visited the city this week and then sped on their ways. They were Mrs. Kenneth Wilson of London and the new Baroness Monchuern of Washington. The Kenneth Wilsons have gone to Southern California but they will return later in the season. Wilson's father was a leading spirit in the old-time Prince of Wales set. It was at his beautiful country residence that the famous baccarat scandal took place. Kenneth Wilson and his wife were at the Mardi Gras ball to get an idea of how San Francisco society exhibits the carnival spirit. Mrs. Wilson was in a stunning Paris gown. She is a noted London beauty and the fine lines of her face and figure quickly drew the admiration of the gay throng.

Another notable figure was Baron Monchuern, the Belgian Minister to Washington. He left the capital a month ago for Mexico City where he was married to the daughter of United States Ambassador Clayton. Husband and wife paid this city a brief visit and then left for Washington. The new Baroness Monchuern is a strikingly handsome woman and will undoubtedly be ranked among the beauties of the present administration.

Quiet Life of Alice Hoffman

Alice Hoffman is busy with her handsome new house over at San Rafael. It is quite near the Sidney Smiths. She not only inherited about forty thousand dollars a few years ago, but she increased that materially by speculations in sugar while she was in Honolulu some time since. I have never yet heard any one make an unpleasant remark about her. She used to dress extremely well, but she does not seem to care for clothes now. Probably no girl has so many invitations as she does but she refuses them all. I have seen her at but one place this winter and that was at the Schmiedells' amateur theatricals.

Making American Coronets

My London correspondent writes me that several of the leading papers are making fun out of a rumor that a number of wealthy American dames have adopted replica of royal crowns as part of their jewelry and that the Coronation will see a number of the new coronets sported in triumph. Mrs. Bradley-Martin is credited with being worth nearly two million dollars and to have tiaras in proportion. Mrs. Charles Yerkes of Chicago, wife of the street railroad magnate who has invaded London, is said to have had a fac-simile of the crown of the Queen Regent of Spain made for her. Mrs. Howard Gould wears a diadem copied from the regalia of the Queen of Italy. Mrs. John Jacob Astor and Mrs. Clarence Mackay are said to affect copies of Queen Alexandra's crown. The list is growing with each publication.

The recent death of Mrs. J. L. Hughes of Sacramenta was particularly sad, as her husband, Lieutenant Hughes, had just been assigned to duty at the Presidio and Mrs. Hughes was looking forward with pleasure to her sojourn here. Mrs. Hughes was a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Gerrish of Sacramento and a sister of Mrs. Younger of Portland, and of Mrs. A. Wedmore Jones of this city.

The New "Wishbone Trip"

Pleasure seekers have just had opened to them a delightful run skirting the bay shore. The Southern Pacific company has dubbed it "The Wishbone Trip." The initial run last Saturday proved so enjoyable that many of the excursionists are going again. The party left on the 8:30 a. m. ferry. Across the bay a handsome chair car, in charge of a porter and special agent, was allotted to their special use. It was hitched to the train that runs through Niles, Warm Springs and the long green undulating slopes on the east side of the bay. At San Jose this special car was sidetracked for the time while the party was divided among several comfortable

A HANDSOME HOTEL.

The march of progress has taken the smart people up town. Time was when all the fashionable hotels were situated in or adjacent to the business district; but nous avons change tout cela. As business has moved westward, the hotels have kept ahead and have gone still farther toward the setting sun.

We need no longer say that San Francisco cannot compare with the Eastern cities in the matter of hotels, since every day new hostelries are taking the place of the old . The latest addition to the list of first-class family hotels here is the Manhattan, Frederick L. Skaggs, proprietor. This hotel opened Fegruary first and has already demonstrated its success. Many Army and Navy people are staying at the Manhattan and the register shows an array of names that proves the hotel to be popular among the ton.

The excellent location of the Manhattan commends it to the business man, as well as to the tourist. It is situated at the junction of Market, Fell and Polk streets, opposite Tenth, and is thus on the route of the principal car lines of the city, also in easy walking distance of the commercial quarter. It has been newly and elegantly furnished, and contains every known modern convenience for the guests' comfort: electric elevators, electric lights; new sanitary plumbing; hot and cold running water in every room. The cuisine and service are irreproachable.

automobiles and whirled at a twenty-mile gait to the most interesting points in the beautiful town. Another special car then picked them up and took them to Los Gatos for luncheon. On returning to San Jose their special car was tacked to the regular train going north among the oaks and orchards lining the west side of the bay. At Palo Alto the party took busses, visited the University buildings, listened to an organ recital in the quaint little church or wandered about the picturesque "quads." At 5:30 they were back in the city, in good time for dinner and brimming over with the delights of the most enjoyable trip to be had around the bay.

Wandering Lawyers Locate a Witness

A footpad was on trial before Superior Judge Lawlor during the past week whose counsel, two young Jewish gentlemen, are just "breaking into" the law. Their nervousness was painful and the air of self-confidence with which they sought to cloak their inexperience was exceedingly ludicrous. The slightest interruption sent their wits a-scattering and they floundered hopelessly about. At last Deputy District Attorney Alford, losing patience, exclaimed:

"If the court please, I wish your honor would instruct the gentlemen to respect, if only in a slight degree, the rules of evidence. They persist in wandering all over the case, without rhyme or reason." The young attorneys were admonished. The next witness was a man who could not speak two words correctly.

"Where were you on the night in question?" he was asked by one of the youthful Kents.

"In my libery, readin'." This caused a titter, that subsided as counsel entered on a tiresome fishing expedition. Suddenly the inquisitor asked, with the biggest voice he could command:

"What were you reading?"

"The Wanderin' Jew," said the witness, wondering what caused the merriment.

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

THE CONNOISSEURS' CHOICE

A symphony expresses harmony. Every part must be in absolute consonance with its fellows. That is why El Symphonie cigar has remained so popular among smokers ever since it was put on the market. It is a perfectly made genuine Havana cigar. Other brands come and go, but El Symphonie stays in favor. It is the choice of connoisseurs. Rinaldo Bros. & Co., the coast distributors of El Symphonie cigars, have been established here since 1870.

Business men and women who find it impossible to go home to lunch consider the Puritan Dining Room, 413 Market street, an excellent substitute. No purer foods or neater service can be obtained at home than at the popular Puritan.

The Lesson of Venus

Ralston Standish had been brought up on what Rudyard Kipling has called "The Sheltered Life" system, and never having been to a public school, he found when he went to Yale that his outlook on life was very different from that of the men of his year. Nevertheless he soon became friendly enough with them and he was regarded as "a good sort" even if he was a bit "straight-laced." When college was over and he began his career he was still classed by the gay twentieth century youths as being thoroughly unsophisticated and a long way from being up-to-date. For this reason none of them could understand the friendship that existed between him and Jack Blades, the gayest rounder of their set. Yet the two seemed to find solace in each other whenever they met.

It was Jack Blades who persuaded Standish to go to the Trocadero and the after supper the night of beautiful Sapho Delorme's premier. He protested at first and declared that that sort of thing wasn't in his line and they could easily fill in with some other man who enjoyed such scenes and company. But for some reason Jack had his heart set on the program. "Come along, old man," he urged, "Blazdell is giving the supper and he's going to be married next month, you know, so everything's bound to be strictly proper. Miss Delorme is coming with her chaperon. I'll give a bond she'll be as quiet as the directress of a girls' boarding school."

So Standish consented, but the sight he saw at the Trocadero was anything but a guarantee that the supper would be a quiet affair. Sapho Delorme was the first woman to win a second glance from Ralston Standish; it was the glance of aroused interest. Perhaps the reports he had read in the papers of her alluring career had something to do with this. The two men had a box opposite the prompt side of the stage and saw her as she came into her dressing room. The arrangements were such that all the boxes on that side commanded a full view of it. And like all the others they saw her with the assistance of her smartly-attired maid proceed leisurely to unrobe and then, with the utmost nonchalance, trip up the steps of a raised pedestal on which stood a gigantic gilded oyster shell waiting to receive her in the character of Aphrodite Anadyomene, or Venus rising from the Foam. She stood there smiling calmly as the curtain rolled down on this first of her famous tableaux vivants.

Standish went to the supper somewhat stunned. Very much to his surprise it proved to be a festive but strictly proper affair. Miss Delorme was attired in an evening gown which was a model of decorum and her behavior would not have been out of place in a model drawing-room. He sat next her and marveled at the change that had come over her. On her part she found his guileless simplicity a refreshing change from the gay sparks who thought brightness meant badness. Her duenna, who was a real chaperon and not the bogus figure-head trotted about by some stars, was likewise much impressed with his "nice" ways. So when he timidly inquired if he might call in the near future they unhesitatingly said "Yes."

As Jack and Standish were standing on the sidewalk after seeing Miss Delorme and her chaperon into their carriage, the irrepressible Blades slapped Ralston on the back, and gleefully remarked, "Jove, old chap, you're it. Everybody's talking of the hit you've made with her. She's always so stand-offish at these suppers. How did you do it?"

"Go slow, Jack," said Standish, "you fellows are mistaken in her, that's all. She's really a nice girl at heart and she's a heap too good to be forced to exhibit herself as she does."

"Maybe so but she gets a thumping big salary for it, just the same."

"Then she ought to learn to spend some of it on her clothes. But I suppose she was educated to think of that life as her profession and she doesn't see the dreadfulness of it all. But she's a lady at heart." And he hailed a cab and went home.

* * * * * * * * * *

"I wonder if that was the wealthy Ralston Standish that I've read of in the papers?" remarked the duenna to Miss Delorme, as they were being driven homeward.

"Yes," was the reply, "I think it is. He's quite different from the others, isn't he? I fancy he doesn't quite approve of me, or of my costumes in the tableaux. Perhaps he thinks I ought to wear an extra coat of paint."

"Or more skirts," added the duenna, "and he's right."

Miss Delorme laughed. This question of the amount of covering was the subject of constant dispute between them, so she murmured softly:

"The ancient actors wore no clothes
But a dab of red on the tip of the nose."

The following day Standish called on Miss Delorme. He found her so happy and domesticated that it seemed almost impossible to believe she was the same person who appeared nightly to public view as the much talked of "Paint and Garter Venus." On her part she discovered he was not the goody-goody young man she had fancied him. By the time the excellent tea she set before him was over, they were a long way on the road to becoming fast friends.

These calls had been going on for some weeks before the fact leaked out among Standish's friends. Dick was delighted with the way Ralston was "getting on." "He's all right," he said to Blazdell, "he'll be a suburban winner yet."

"Why, I thought he was supposed to be engaged to that rich Susan Tavish, who is doing so much tenement work, or slum work, or some such thing."

"Not a bit of it: it was a hard crush once but now that he's smashed on Sapho, I suppose that's all off."

"You don't think Venus will win against Minerva if Standish is the judge, do you? Why, he's almost in Minerva's class in piety."

"Four to one on Venus," was the laughing reply.

* * * * * * * * * *

Meanwhile, Miss Delorme was becoming more and more interested in her conscientious admirer.

"He's very wealthy, and you really might do worse, my dear," one day hazarded the duenna. She received a reply that almost snapped her head off, and murmured to herself, "Why, upon my word, I do believe the girl is really falling in love with him."

As for Standish, he was sublimely unconscious of the way his friends were discussing his intimacy with Miss Delorme. It certainly never occurred to him that the latter looked on him as anything but an ordinary acquaintance. He never told her of his new life, but he used to go to the Trocadero almost every night and gradually he became accustomed to seeing her in scant stage attire. The place didn't seem to be so dreadful, after all.

* * * * * * * * * *

One day when he called on her she found him in an unusually melancholy and sentimental mood. She made tea exactly to his taste, as she had adroitly learned, and when he was comfortably settled in the big arm chair, she sympathetically said, "Tell me all about it."

So encouraged by the tea, and the genial surroundings and her kindly manner, he confessed that a girl was the cause of it all.

"Some one you care for very much?" she asked.

"She's all the world to me," he confessed, looking at her with luminous eyes. "I sometimes think she regards me as a perfect idiot because I don't know life as she knows it; because I don't approve of everything she does."

"And have you told her of your love?"

"No, not exactly; but I fancy she may guess it. I hope so, anyway."

"Have you asked her to give up the things you disapprove of?"

"Well, no; but she knows what they are; she's bright and don't require such notice."

Then he swallowed a big, lugubrious sigh and tore himself away from the inviting surroundings. But the conversation seemed to have done him good and he looked more cheerful.

Left alone, Miss Delorme went to a bureau drawer and drew out a big envelope which had arrived from abroad that morning. When the duenna came into the room half an hour later she was still wrapped up in its contents. "Well, my dear," said the duenna, "have you made up your mind about that manager's offer? How much is it a week?"

"Five hundred dollars."

"Bless me, that's nearly twice what you're getting here. You must be out of your senses not to snap at it."

"Perhaps; but I'm going to refuse it, just the same. I'm going to give up the tableau business."

The duenna threw up her hands. Then she seemed to comprehend. "May I congratulate you, dear?" she said.

"Oh, no—at least, not yet," said Miss Delorme, with a show of color.

Next day she paid particular attention to her toilet. Then she sat dreaming till a certain ring at the bell brought the color again to her cheeks. Standish came in looking bright and happy.

"Why, Ralston," she said, "how you've cheered up!"

"Why shouldn't I?" he exclaimed, with animation, "she loves me," and he looked at her joyfully.

"How did you find it out?" she asked playfully.

"Why, I took your advice: I asked her."

"Asked her—when—how? What's her name?"

"Sue Tavish, you must have heard of her. She's the girl who has been doing such wonderful settlement work."

"I-I—yes, of course, I've heard of her." And she congratulated him.

Soon after he had gone the curious duenna found Miss Delorme again absorbed in the contents of the big envelope. "I thought you wrote them a refusal, this morning," she said.

"Yes, I did," replied the famous Venus, "but man proposes and—not always to the right girl. I'm just writing them a cable to cancel my letter and send me the contract."

THE WAY OF THE GAY WORLD.

(An O'er True Fable.)

A Needy Young Woman with a Fair Lineage, some Beauty and a Large and Combative Taste for Luxury, set her Heart on wedding a Young Man of Loose Morals and a big Bank Account. She obtained the coveted Introduction and followed up the Chase right briskly. After the marriage she helped him to Disburse his Money in a Princely Fashion that gave the Gossips gilt-edge material to Talk about. The staple of the Functions given by the young couple was Plenty to Drink, and they set the Joyous Example. The Lady had a Steadier Head than her Husband, so she stood the Pace better, and was quite Fit when he was compelled to seek Refuge.

By and by, the Fortune took Wings.

"Never mind," said the Husband, "I will work and carve a new fortune."

"Never mind," said the Wife, "I can Sing a little. I will go into Vaudeville."

They Talked Nobly and so Loud they were heard by the Reporters and Special Writers, and soon the Whole World became interested in their Struggle to Climb back to their Wealthy Station. The Man soon dropped into Obscurity, but the Woman went on the Stage and made a Pot of Money. Then she began to think it was not Right for her to be Earning Money that might be Called For any day by her needy Husband. She decided to Divorce him. As the Easiest Way she rang in the plea of Habitual Intemperance. The Judge liked the looks of the Lady and she got her decree in less than an hour and sailed out from the Courtroom triumphantly—a Free Woman.

A few days later she was seen walking in the street with her ex-Husband. One of those who had watched the affair from Start to Finish—the Chase, the Capture, the Chaotic Crash—saw them promenading and he said:

"Verily, she's willing to be Friends with him, because Kind Words and Smiles cost Nothing, but as a Husband—well, he would be an Expensive Luxury."

MAMIE'S STUNNING STYLE.

Mamie wears a stunning raglan—oh, dear me!
Mamie in her stunning raglan is a sight to see!
For the way that Mamie wears it, and the way she twists and bends,
Makes it hard to tell just where the raglan starts and Mamie ends.
Mamie wouldn't wear a coffee sack, of that I'm sure.
Mamie likes to be in style and Mamie is demure,
Yet Mamie doesn't hesitate to amble up the street
Looking like a bale of hay that's grown a pair of feet.

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought or other fads. Instruction private, not classes. We solicit investigation.

STAGE

At the Alcazar

While Mr. Alsop does some remarkably good acting as Bailey Prothero in "The Rogue's Comedy" at the Alcazar this week, it is to Mr. Osbourne that the laurels should go for the best sustained character. As Robert Cushing, the sub-villain who does Prothero's dirty work and incidentally helps himself to his chief's silverware and cigars, Osbourne leaves nothing to be desired. The men are rather better than the women, as a whole. Either Miss Convere has been miscast in every role she has sustained since she assumed her position at this theatre or else she is incapable of filling leading parts. Whatever the reason, she has been unsuited to everything she has appeared in thus far. She is a pretty woman but so self-conscious that she never forgets her identity for five minutes at a time. I have looked for her to do good work in a comedy part but the few that have fallen to her have not fitted her any better than the emotional roles.

Not so Good as "Zorah"

If "Raglan's Way" had come before "Zorah" there would have been considerably less disappointment with regard to the former. For in "Zorah" Edwin Arden showed such decided strength as a playwright that "Raglan's Way" seems all the more threadbare in contrast. The play at the Grand this week lacks clearness and while there is some originality displayed in the dialogue and situations there is nothing sufficiently striking to remain in memory after one has left the theatre. The play is well acted if without much brilliancy.

Belasco and Thall are expecting in the near future to present a new play by Charles Francis Bryant, who is not without experience in that line, having made several adaptations in the past several years. Mr. Bryant states that his play is a departure from the present dramatic theory and that he has some original ideas that will make old timers open their eyes.

Miss "Libby" Cone, who a year ago surprised her friends by going on the stage while on a visit to New York is now home again after a successful tour with Broadhurst's own "What Happened to Jones" company. Her stage name is Elizabeth Elliston, and it is hoped that she will go on at one of the local theatres during the summer before going East to join Frohman.

Ade's Hair Turned Red

George Ade whose Filipino satire, "The Sultan of Zulu," will shortly be produced in Chicago, has appeared in a new character, that of a census expert. Mr. Ade says that there are several hundred million red-headed girls in Chicago, and bases his statistics on the fact that his recent advertisement for six-Titian-tinted chorus girls brought applications from an army of red-haired damsels, which swamped the capacity of the two stage doors of the Studebaker theatre and choked navigation along the adjacent thoroughfare. As Titian blondes are proverbially emotional and tempestuous, the awful riot on the part of the several hundred million chorus girls who were not selected, Mr. Ade says, turned his hair red in a single night.

Cardinals have been exploited on the stage more than once. Richelieu and Wolsey, as seen in "The Three Guardsmen" and "Henry VIII," respectively, are not flattering characterizations of the wearers of the Red Hat. The Cardinal in "In the Palace of the King" is not noteworthy. But Cardinal de Medici, whom Mr. Willard impersonates in his new play, is said to be a most lovable person. It is a bold stroke on the part of a dramatist to introduce a confessional scene on the stage. Mr. Parker has done it in "The Cardinal," using the scene to ennoble the confessor.

How Viola Became Violent

Viola Allen earned the sobriquet of "Violent" Allen, which still clings to her in New York, through "The Conquerors," Paul Potter's tempestuous play, when it had its Gotham premier. There was a large ballet in the piece and the girls were so much struck with Miss Allen's efforts to evade the Russian officer in the act where he chases her around the stage that they named her Violent. I can well understand why Frank Worthing refused to play John Storm to Viola Allen's Glory Quayle in the original production of "The Christian," and why E. J. Morgan resigned from the role after a short season of it. The other people in the play seem like marionettes beside Miss Allen. In "In the Palace of the King" she dwarfs everybody but the dwarf, and he is so amazingly good that he positively cannot be thrust into the background. Miss Allen has changed much since she appeared here with Joe Jefferson as Lydia Languish in "The Rivals." She has gained in beauty and poise, even, since her last visit here somewhat over five years ago. But I prefer her in a stock company rather than as a star.

Hawaiian Glee Club, at the Orpheum

N. S. HAND THE EXPERT HANDICAPPER

And author of the original "American Handicapping System" and of "Hand's Improved System of Handicapping," has returned from the East and opened an office in this city for the purpose of supplying old and new subscribers with legitimate and high-class handicap figures on the California races.

Clever Little Minstrels

Of all the Midway Plaisance shows at the Fairyland Carnival that closes tonight at the Pavilion, none attracted such favorable attention as Professor Bothwell Browne's Juvenile Minstrel Company, of which H. B. Tiedemann is the business manager. The children have been splendidly drilled and being naturally talented their performance is of a high order. The program given by the little minstrels is: Grand introductory overture, The Military Man; German specialty, Eunice Gilman; The Mick Who Threw the Brick, Robert Kavanaugh; French specialty, Myrtle Dingwall; coon song, Jessie Brown; soprano solo, Philip Atkins; Polish dance, Henrietta Keller and Ernest Young; Chinese song, Marie Nichols; instep dance, Montague Barton; American dance, Elsie Wahlicht; grand finale, ragtime Florodora, Philip Atkins, the interlocutor is as effective in his role as the great West himself. The bones, Charles Lamp and Ernest Young, and the tambos, Herbert Kavanaugh and Montague Barton, are likewise gifted with agile wit.

Lillian Burkhart is the author of a very clever article in the February Home magazine of New York. She writes about "Little Laughs Behind the Scenes." One of the "little laughs" concerns the rather pathetic manner in which a stage-struck wife was cured of her desires, and it is worth perusal by all who labor under the delusion that stage life is a synonym for an easy and happy existence.

Attractions Next Week

There'll be a new star at the Grand next week—George Ober, who for many years was principal comedian for Charles Hoyt. While Mr. Ober is especially known for his creations of Uncle Joe, the Oldest Inhabitant and Judge Doe, in "A Temperance Town," and also for his work in "What Happened to Jones" and other Hoyt and Broadhurst plays, his stage record extends much further back than that. He once played Cockles to the Rip of Joseph Jefferson and he was a member of the famous cast which supported Frank Mayo in "Macbeth." During his engagement at the Grand he will be seen in four of Hoyt's clever plays. The opening bill will be "A Temperance Town" which probably made more money for Hoyt than any other single play he ever wrote. The cast required for the play is large and in addition to Mr. Ober and the regular stock company of the theatre, a number of new people have been engaged.

Winchermann's trained bears and monkeys are the stars on the Orpheum's bill this week and will continue to delight old and young all next week. Mary Norman's caricatures of society girls are clever; she will vary her monologue next week. The Merrills will also remain and the new people will be headed by the Hawaiian Glee Club of ten men who appear for the first time in vaudeville. They wear the white costume of the tropics and play on large and small guitars, 'cello, flute and saxophone, giving six vocal numbers. During the reign of King Kalakaua the Glee Club was the official musical organization of the court, and since the time of abolishing the monarchical form of government has been the centre of attraction and the principal entertainer of visitors to Honolulu. The Blossoms, comedy acrobats, and Warren and Blanchard, lyric comedians, will complete the novelties.

Prices will be brought to the regular level for "Way Down East" which comes to the Columbia next week for a fortnight run which is sure to duplicate the play's popularity last season. The bucolic drama appeals to a large class of theatregoers and is always sure of drawing large houses. The snowstorm scene in "Way Down East" is a very clever bit of stage mechanism.

"The Ameer" will have some new songs next week for its farewell. It has had a most successful run. "The Serenade" will follow, on February twenty-fourth. This was one of the Bostonians' biggest hits, its only superior in their repertory being "Robin Hood." This will be the first time the opera has ever been given at popular prices. All the original business will be used.

"The Oriental Express," a clean, wholesome comedy in three acts from the German of "Die Orient Reise," will follow "The Rogue's Comedy" at the Alcazar next Monday night. The authors of this farce also wrote "At the White Horse Tavern," which will shortly be produced at the Alcazar. The plot of "The Oriental Express" deals with Robert Fetherston, who, with his wife, is touring Europe on what is called "circular" tickets, many complications resulting from a change of these en route.

"An African King" will follow "A Young Wife" at the Central.

Mrs. Fred H. Hanson, the talented elocutionist of Boston, gave one of her delightful monologue recitals before the students of Mills college on Friday evening, and also appeared before the Philomath club on Monday afternoon.

PALMISTRY A POPULAR SCIENCE.

Interest in the science of palmistry continues to increase, and the professional palmist has attained a wonderful vogue. One of the most successful exponents of this fascinating science is Professor Weller, of 1007½ Market street, who combines the talents of clairvoyant, scientific palmist and card reader. He has had great success in deciphering palms, reading futures and delineating characters. Professor Weller teaches his profession to others. His fees are moderate.

LETTERS

A Real Child

Since first the child was discovered as a motive in story writing we have had children a-plenty in all their variety from the little prigs and Pharisees who have successfully undertaken the conversion of their families, the rehabilitation of the family fortunes and the regeneration of the world down to the blackguard and guttersnipe type, irreclaimable by either law or gospel. It would seem as if there were no possible condition which had been exploited and no deed left undone and unchronicled. All the while there was treasure trove for the right seeker, and when George Madden Martin began to give in McClure's the story of Emmy Lou's progress through the public school, it was recognized not only that she had discovered a new child, but a new field as well. Emmy is a very ordinary little girl, sweet and natural, but neither an imp nor an angel. She is just the kind of a child who would be expected to have no history in particular, but to plod along in the beaten track, an "average child." This is just about what Emmy is doing, and it is just here that she becomes a valuable addition to the chronicles of child life. Mrs. Martin is not making any effort to produce an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" of the public schools but for all that, no one can read the experiences of this child without feeling that the school is more or less on trial. No one is to conclude from this that there are any "awful disclosures" of cruelty, neglect, or other evils. Emmy is doing very well and holding her own, thus far, but glimpses of school from the child's standpoint when the child is neither a spoiled darling nor an unlicked cub are a useful innovation.

The proverbial saying with regard to the lack of honor which attends the prophet in his own home assuredly does not hold good for San Francisco. Local publications, if they have a shadow of merit are invariably well received at first, and given a chance to prove their worth, and in the Bookman list of the best selling for the month ending January first, we note three—"Jingles from Japan," "Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum" and "California Violets," all home productions, and what is still more worth noting in these prosaic times, all poetry.

Marie Corelli has been made the recipient of a massive silver rose bowl bearing the inscription: "Presented to Miss Marie Corelli by the Edinburg Philosophical Institution, in grateful recognition of the brilliant address delivered by her on the nineteenth of November, 1901." In making the presentation, the chairman, Mr. Sutherland, mentioned that a similar acknowledgement of eminent service to the institution had been made to Charles Dickens. After that, where do the carping critics stand?

Maxim Gorky has excited more consternation in Russia, in the brief time since he has taken to literature, than has Tolstoi in all the years of his career. There is positive alarm at his popularity, and occasion is found or made for his arrest whenever possible. Tolstoi is too unstable and so apt to swing from one extreme to the other, that when some criticism was recently directed against Isabel Hapgood, who is the medium through whom most of his work finds its way into English, because of her alleged inaccuracies, Madame Tolstoi herself came to the rescue with the assurance that the fault was not with Miss Hapgood but with the author himself, who was given not only to changing the form of expression, but the ideas, so that by the time any piece of work had finally escaped from his hands, it stood a fair chance to be in direct contradiction to what it was in its inception.

It has been said that any one could write at least one story, and in these days it is little more than a fact that most people make at least one attempt. Therefore there is nothing surprising in the announcement that John Philip Sousa has tried his hand and given the world "The Fifth String."

Cyrus Townsend Brady's novel just completed in the "Century" is already on its way to the stage. With the name changed from "Barbarossa" to "Hohenzollern," it is to be produced by James K. Hackett. Mr. Brady, it will be remembered, was, until quite recently, a minister, but concluded that there was more money for him in a literary career.

Nordica Will Sing Next Week

It is good news to hear that Madame Nordica is herself again and that the three deferred song recitals will be given next week, on Monday and Wednesday nights and Saturday afternoon. The last date being a legal holiday, no doubt many more gentlemen will be present than is usual at matinee performances. Seats are now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. The following brilliant programs will be rendered: Monday, The Robin Sings, Thy Beaming Eyes, MacDowell; All For You, d'Hardelot; Song of Thanksgiving, Allitsen; Voi Che Sapete, Mozart; Ariette, Vidal; Si Mes Vers Avaient des Ailes, Hahn; Filles de Cadiz, Delibes; Polonaise (C sharp minor), Chopin, Mr. Simmons; Ich Liebe Dich, Im Kahn, Grieg; Lotusblume, Schumann; Es Blinkt der Thau, Rubinstein; Serenade, Richard Strauss; Brunhilde's Call, Wagner. Wednesday.—Serenade, Boucher, Berceuse, Chaminade, Chere Nuit, Bachelet; Elsa's Dream, Wagner; Widmung and Waldesgesprach, Schumann, Solvejg's Wiegenlied, Grieg; Veilchen, Kirchgang, Von Fielitz; Barcarolle, Rubinstein; Polish Dance, Scharwenka, Mr. Simmons; Longing, Schlesinger, Ecstasy, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, At Parting, Rogers, Titania's Cradle, Liza Lehmann, Spring Song, Oscar Weil, Grand Aria from Hungarian Opera "Laslos," Erkel. Saturday.—Eliland song cycle, Von Fielitz; Spinning Song, Wagner-Liszt, Mr. Simmons; Obstination, Fontenailles, Toujours, Maude V. White, A'Toi, Bemberg; Haidenroeslein, Schubert; Angels Ever Bright and Fair, Handel, Serenade, Richard Strauss; Polonaise (Mignon), Thomas.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra

The largest musical organization that has visited this city in many years is the Chicago Symphony orchestra, which will be heard here in four concerts the last week of this month. This orchestra consists of over half a hundred instrumentalists, under the direction of Mr. Adolph Rosenbecker, and is accompanied on its tour by four eminent soloists. Madame Ragna Linne is a dramatic soprano, who made a great success with the Grau English opera company, E. C. Towne is an American tenor who has been soloist with all the big oratorio societies, Mr. Jan Van Oordt, the violinist, is a Hollander and has met with success at the Thomas and Damrosch concerts, and Mr. Franz Wagner is a violoncellist of the first rank. All these artists will be heard in important works at these concerts. The symphonies to be played are: Wednesday night, February twenty-sixth, Mendelssohn's "Scotch"; Friday night, the twenty-eighth, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique"; Saturday afternoon, March first, Beethoven's Seventh; and Saturday night, Raff's "Leonore." The Saturday afternoon concert will be devoted entirely to the works of Beethoven and Wagner, and Saturday night will be "soloist's night" on which occasion each of the four soloists will contribute numbers. These concerts will not be strictly symphony concerts, but the programs will each be divided into two parts, the first being symphonic in character and the second in lighter vein. Among the attractive numbers to be rendered are Bizet's Carmen suite, Grieg's Peer Gynt suite, Tschaikowsky's overture 1812, which describes Napoleon's invasion of Moscow, Litolf's Robespierre overture, Saint-Saens' Dance of Death, etc. The violinist will play the Wieniawski and Beethoven concertos, and the cellist's number will be the Saint-Saens and Volkmann concertos. Complete programs can be had at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s where the sale of seats for the season opens Monday morning. Seats for single concerts will be ready Thursday morning. Prices are popular, ranging from seventy-five cents to one dollar and a half.

The Pasmores in Oaklend

The Pasmores will give a concert at the First Unitarian church, Oakland, on Tuesday evening, the twenty-fifth instant. The vocalists will be Mrs. Edith Scott Basford, Mrs. Charles C. Hughes and Mr. H. B. Pasmore. Among the numbers will be the trio in E flat, op. 1, No. 1, by Beethoven, which was so brilliantly played at a concert in this city and at the Fabbri-Mueller testimonial; three songs by W. J. McCoy; "Adelaide," by Beethoven; the air for the G string by Bach, accompanied by a string quartet of Alexander Stewart's pupils.

Among our younger singers none is making better progress than Beulah George, who is working very hard and is full of ambition. When Emma Nevada last visited us she was particularly taken with her method of using her voice. She told Mrs. Mills, before a lot of the college students, that Miss George's voice was the best of any young singer she had heard in America.

Of Rose Relda's trial performance recently in Frankfort-on-the-Main the Nachrichten said: "In the role of Lucia Miss Relda gave proof of diligent study and unusual talent. Her coloratura is pure and accurate. Her acting showed great promise. It is but fair to state that the singer was hampered by having to sing German, a language in which she is a novice, and that Edgardo gave her miserable support." Any news of Relda's success is welcomed by her San Francisco friends who are following her career with warmest interest. The impression created in her last work here, some two years ago, was flattering and rosy prophecies were then made for her future.

The Sacramento Saturday club at its one hundred and twentieth recital gave an entire program on Shakespeare music, including many interesting numbers. The program opened by a a paper, "Shakespeare in Music," by Mrs. W. E. Briggs, illustrated musically by Mrs. Robert Hawley and Miss Dierssen, and this was followed by a varied program of vocal and instrumental numbers, all illustrative of the subject. Mrs. W. E. Briggs was director for the day.

Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt gave a brilliant rendition of a Chopin valse before the recent Federation of Women's Clubs in this city. It was Mrs. Mansfeldt's first public appearance since her long illness, which debarred her from all public work for a tedious period.

The Birmingham (England) Daily Mail has the following in one of its January issues: "Madame Caro Roma, the popular prima donna of Mr. J. W. Turner's opera company, is not only an accomplished cantatrice but also an authoress and composer of distinction. Some time ago we reviewed in the Mail her exquisite little volume of poems entitled, 'Some Idle Moments,' and a number of charming lyrical songs. Before us we have her latest contribution to the musical literature of the day, which is a song cycle, 'The Wandering One,' both words and music by Madame Roma (M. Witmark and Sons, New York and London). The cycle comprises six numbers, Absence, The Lament, Doubt Not, The Prayer, The Letter, and The Return. A leitmotive of four bars is employed throughout the cycle, and appears interwoven in all kinds of forms and harmonic varieties. The subject at once attracts attention by its captivating melodic charm, which can be easily traced. An impassioned character, an exquisite and polyphonic accompaniment, help to make these admirably-written songs rare gems of their kind. Novel features of the composition are the instrumental modulations, prefaced to each song, so that each can be sung independently. It needs an artist to sing them, an artist who has temperament, also a cultured performer to cope with the elaborate accompaniments. 'The Prayer' is a monotone for the voice, the accompaniment expressing a language of its own. 'The Letter' has an accompaniment in chords of sixths for alternate hands, conceived in the manner of Henselt's famous 'Bird Study.' 'The Return' is in tempo di valse, most brilliantly and effectively written. The whole cycle will be sung for the first time here by Miss Amy Kendal at one of the Royal Society of Artists' musical matinees in the spring." I have received a copy of the song cycle so well described by the English critic. It is a very fine composition and places our Californian Roma high in the ranks of song writers. A song cycle is a difficult thing to write and only one well versed in poetry and harmony would dare attempt this form of composition.

SOMETHING NEW IN NEGLIGEES.

Men who like to be comfortable in warm weather have hitherto objected to the negligee shirt to be worn without a waistcoat on the ground that they felt only half-dressed with their suspenders so close to their coats. This objection has been swept aside by the very clever contrivance in the Geo. P. Ide & Co. "Gold" waists for men. In these negligees, the suspenders are attached to the inside of the shirt and are thus invisible. The "Gold" brand shirt waist commends itself to the sensible man who is not averse to being in fashion. Geo. P. Ide & Co.'s "Silver" brand collars are the correct thing to be worn on a negligee or soft front shirt. The local agency for the Geo. P. Ide & Co. shirts, collars and cuffs is at 516-518 Market street.

THE ORIGINAL VIENNA UP-TOWN

Already the old patrons of the Original Vienna Bakery, when it was located at 205 Kearny street, have become used to the new location at 133-135 O'Farrell street. Mr. Galindo, the proprietor, feels that he could not have made a better move than this one, judging by the steady patronage of the new cafe, patronage constantly increasing. Everything in the Original Vienna Cafe, from the menu to the service and table-furnishings, is of the best.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

In a Persian Garden

Liza Lehmann's song cycle "In a Persian Garden," from the Rubaiyat was rendered in Portland on February first, by a quartet consisting of Mrs. Albert Sheldon, soprano, Mrs. Walter Reed (Rose Coursen), contralto, William Webster, tenor, M. Fleischner, bass; Mrs. Edward Drake at the piano. Apropos this song recital, many requests have been made for a repetition of the recent rendition under H. B. Pasmore's direction, thus overriding the ultra-critical opinion that Liza Lehmann's work is "poor stuff." It may be poor to the instrumentalist, but Mr. Pasmore himself says, "I hold that as a vehicle for showing the artistic powers of the singer, both from the technical standpoint and that of artisic expression it is one of the best things of late years. In fact I know of nothing else so good."

The Eaton Organ Recital

The first of the free organ recitals by Mr. Louis H. Eaton, organist of Trinity church, given last Monday evening was a complete artistic success, the program being interesting and well chosen. Organ recitals have been given in this city at various times, sometimes by visiting organists of world-wide fame, at other times by our local organists. While they never drew large audiences they were always enjoyed by the more musical in our midst. I remember more than one series of delightful recitals by Dr. H. J. Stewart, Mr. Eaton's predecessor at Trinity. The program selected by Mr. Eaton consisted of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G major, Cesar Franck's Fantasie in C, Alexandre Guilmant's First Meditation, op. 20, and Charles Marie Widor's Symphonie VI, op. 42, No. 2. The four movements of the Franck fantasie range through many moods which the organist interpreted with fine understanding, bringing this quality also to the five movements of the Widor symphony. Two vocal numbers varied the organ recital. Mrs. Birmingham rendered the Schubert aria "Great is Jehovah" and Miss Flynn the Mendelssohn aria "Hear Ye Israel," both being in admirable voice.

A Correction

In regard to a recent article concerning the introduction of the Burrowes musical kindergarten system here by Mrs. Frances B. Williams, it appears that I did not present a correct impression in connection with two factors in the case. Mrs. Williams tells me that she did not introduce the Virgil Clavier here, but bought a number of them from a pupil of A. K. Virgil, who was out here some years ago, and has supplied the places of those disposed of from time to time though never really having the agency for them. It was a natural mistake as it was through Mrs. Williams that many of our musicians came to know the value of the Clavier. Again her knowledge of the Burrowes Musical Kindergarten system was obtained from a Burrowes pupil, who was on the coast some time since. Mrs. Williams is so advanced in her ideas one does not stop to consider the source of her knowledge, but considers easily the prominent fact that she has acquired something new and is dispensing it for public musical benefit.

Josef Hofmann will give one more recital here after his matinee today, and then he will positively say good-bye. The last recital will be given tomorrow evening at the Columbia theatre, when he will play a program of the most successful numbers in his repertory. Among these are the "Tannhauser" overture the Schubert-Liszt "Marche Hongroise," three Chopin compositions, two of Mendelssohn's and two of Moszkowski's. He will also play Beethoven's "32 Variations."

The choir of St. Dominic's church will at the regular monthly musical service tomorrow evening present the first part of Verdi's celebrated Marzoni Requiem, a dramatic work rarely given. The music will be under the direction of James Hamilton Howe, organist and director, and there will also be given the Prelude and Fugue (Bach), Priere (Guilmant), "The Storm" (Lemmens), "Processional" (Verdi)

Emma Nevada will give one song recital here early in March. She has in her company this year Pablo Casals, 'cellist, Maquarre, flutist, and Moreau, pianist.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff, vs. William Henry Weston, Defendant. — Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

ALBERT MAHONY, Clerk.
By THOS. F. O'NEIL, Deputy Clerk.

The Last Minetti

There was any number of musicians among the audience at the final recital of the Minetti string quartet. One could tell that by the way they applauded. Only a musician familiar with the technical difficulties of the works rendered could give them real appreciation though their beauty might commend them to the unlearned. The first number was the Beethoven string quartet in C minor, op. 18, No. 4. This was given with fine exactitude, and the five movements delineated with skill and expression. The andante scherzoso quasi allegretto was very pleasing, though not, perhaps, more so than the final allegro. A violin sonate in A major by Handel was rendered by Mr. Minetti, with Mr. Fleishman at the piano, a most scholarly interpretation in every particular. Mr. Minetti seems to take great delight in bringing out the beauties of these old compositions, so full of delicate harmonies. The Dvorak piano quintet in A major, op. 81, was given with brilliant effect. The quartet this season is formed by G. Minetti, first violin; S. Savannah, second violin; L. Kowalski, viola; A. Weiss, violoncello. S. G. Fleishman was the pianist at Saturday evening's concert. These recitals appeal strongly to our cultured musical people and I do not see why they are not more largely attended by students of music. Living, as we do, so far away from the great musical centres, it seems to me that our students should learn to appreciate what opportunities there are here. An acquaintance with chamber music is certainly as much a part of a piano or string student's education as is knowledge of the best ancient and modern authors to a student of literature. I should imagine that a series of chamber music recitals during the Lenten period might become popular. They could be given in the morning, eleven o'clock being a suitable hour, and I predict that they would speedily gain a large attendance.

Californians in New York

The Staatszeitung of New York, the foremost German newspaper in the United States, contained a critique on "concert night" at the Arion club on January sixteenth, from which I clip the following as of interest to San Franciscans: "Particular lustre was imparted to the performance by two guests, Signor Abramoff and his pupil, Miss Edith Decker, from San Francisco. The latter has been endowed by nature with great charm and possesses a soprano voice of fine quality, the excellent schooling of which distinctly shows the master hand of her teacher. Miss Decker delighted her large audience with an air by Gounod while Signor Abramoff also earned rapt applause for his admirable rendering of the famous bass air from 'Fra Diavalo.'"

MY VALENTINE GIRL

Her trailing robes are of snowy lace,
And as white is the beautiful, mocking face;
And it dims in the firelight's fainter play
As it fades and dies into ashes gray.
And I sigh as I think what my soul could feel
If my beautiful Valentine girl were real.

L. T. P.

A SUBTLE DISTINCTION.

"That men are forward nowadays,"
The careful mother cried,
"And must be sat upon sometimes,
By no one is denied."

Her giddy daughter smiled and said,
"You need not warn me more.
The ways are known to me and I
Have sat on them before."

—Gwendolen G.

THE UP-TO-DATE PLAY.

"The play's the thing," so used to run
The motto of the stage
In Garrick's and in Siddons' time,
When acting was the rage.
But times are changed. A play succeeds,
And loud the plaudits ring,
Provided all the critics say
"The dresses are 'the thing.'"

—The First Nighter.

AFFECTIONATE, BUT MIXED.

Here is an item from last week's issue of the Cork Weekly: John writes to Mary:

"Dear Mary: We are all very well, only mother has hysterics, Tim has the toothache, Jane has a baby and I hope you are the same way. Your affectionate brother John."

KEEPING THE SECRET FROM HIM.

A widow with two little boys recently married a San Rafael storekeeper. He is devoted to his stepsons and is never so happy as when playing games with them. One day the elder boy ran to his mother and exclaimed, confidentially: "Oh, ma, our new pa is so really good to us, please don't ever tell him he isn't our own father, 'cause maybe he wouldn't care so much for me and Freddie if he really knew."

GRASS IN ANY SHAPE AFFECTED HIM.

An Oakland man, afflicted with attacks of hay fever, while walking along the Lake Merritt boulevard with a friend, broke out in his regulation complaint that it was about time that his affliction should begin. "A wisp of hay," he wailed, "or the down of a peach will start me."

Just then a grass-widow passed and the man was seiz d with a racking fit of sneezing.

"You're a little too sensitive," said the other, "a pretty widow like that is not to be sneezed at."

"Why, even the hairs of your head are numbered."

"Yes, but most of them are back numbers."

OUR OPINION

Our Boom in Social Display

The contrast in prosperity between rising young America and effete Europe seems to be more marked in social circles than in business affairs. Social life in New York, according to report, has never reveled in more brilliant display, while in London the papers are lamenting the social stagnation. Shopkeepers in the English metropolis are grumbling and some persons are beginning to argue that the smart set is becoming so lazy that it will not exert itself even in search of entertainment. Preparations for the coronation furnish topics for endless discussion and chat, but it seems that titled personages are averse to parading their state coaches in procession to the House of Lords, or to becoming conspicuous figures in a public procession. Earl Roberts drove to Westminster in an ordinary cab on the opening of Parliament. Most of the newspapers agree that the day of pomp is gone by. Contrast this state of affairs with the newspaper comments of gay society life in New York. They call it the Era of Burning Money. The bonfires are said to be flaming all along the swell Fifth avenue shopping district, and going at a rate that would have made the ancients, fabled for their luxury, stare and write themselves down novices. In the jewelers', the florists', the modistes', the milliners', the furnishers' —everywhere it is the same. Ask any tradesman in the fashionable district and he will tell you that his sales have increased fifty per cent during the last eighteen months and that his prices have gone up in proportion. Rents in this favored shopping section are bounding upward at a tremendous rate, thus offering a barometer on the fabulous profits the shopkeepers must be reaping and an index on what the wealthy customers must be spending. For instance, a wealthy tailor bought a piece of property with a twenty-five foot frontage on Fifth avenue some two years ago on speculation. Today he holds it at two hundred thousand dollars. He has declined an offer of thirteen thousand dollars a year for ground rent, or more than five hundred dollars a front foot. He wants fifteen thousand dollars and the chances are he will get it and in addition will get a rent equal to ten per cent for all improvements. As the old building will have to be torn down and a new one erected for business purposes, say at a cost of forty-thousand dollars, this means that the property will bring, in rents, when improved, nineteen thousand dollars a year, under a ten years' lease, or an assured income of one hundred and ninety thousand dollars on an investment of less than eighty-five thousand dollars. This, the newspapers claim, is an illustration of the way fortunes are being made in New York real estate. Incidentally it also shows the extravagant expenditures of the smart set, for the high rents obtained by this lucky landlord must be made by his tenant out of the society people who patronize his store. These profits are safe and certain. In the same block where this property is located a fashionable woman last week bought a dress costing seventeen hundred dollars. It was a beautiful imported and exclusive design and she took it without a murmur at the price. Profits on sales of this kind are stimulating to the cheerful Manhattan shopkeepers. No wonder that London is in the dumps and New York rejoices over the social display.

Mrs. Blaine's Plan Fizzles Out

The servant girl question seems to be as far as ever from solution. Some time ago it was heralded abroad that Mrs. Blaine of Chicago had found a satisfactory adjustment to the difficulty by arranging that her help should have only eight hours of continuous service and the servants should have the same amount of leisure as other workers enjoy. The recent announcement that Mrs. Blaine has given up housekeeping and gone to board seems to indicate that the arrangement was not an ideal one, after all. Matters appear to move smoothly enough in hotels, where there is an unvarying system, and in large private establishments. But the women who employ one or two assistants, and the general servants themselves are at perennial swords' points. Many women, when they keep a single servant, imagine they should be emancipated from any household duty. The girl must be up early and down late, and on her feet all day long, with neither rest nor recreation. Nagging and tyrannizing cause perhaps as much of the trouble as independence, carelessness and laziness. Much has been said and written about the tractable and meek Mongolian who is supposed to have solved the problem for the housewives of this coast, but in addition to the exaggeration of the ease and comfort which they are supposed to enjoy there is another factor In the bottom of her heart every woman has a wholesome fear of a man, and many of the irritations which are practiced with impunity on a white woman are not dreamed of with the Chinese male. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps gave us, in her "Successors to Mary the First," a picture of the kind of women who are most exacting of their servants. Here was a family of three, husband, wife and half-grown daughter, who had had a good servant, and the whole domestic arrangement was shifted to Mary's shoulders, while the mistress wrote club papers and the daughter careered about the streets on her bicycle. Mary concluded to preside over a home of her own, and the Hollis family sat about with hands in their laps and called on Providence to work a miracle for them. The wife could not find her way about her own kitchen nor the daughter make her own bed, and yet Mrs. Phelps represented them as martyrs to their domestics, and seemed to think that a woman so utterly useless and helpless was fit to give directions to a competent girl. What was intended as an arraignment of the servants was in reality an exposure of the incompetency of the mistresses. If men had as little practical knowledge of the businesses they conduct and as small comprehension of their endurance and capacity as most women of their servants and household labor the problem would be an appalling tangle. As it is, the servant problem is a thing apart, and until most housewives become educated to more than a feeble knowledge of their domestic affairs there will always be a servant problem. Meanwhile, the eight-hour, which is impracticable in most instances, appears to have proved a failure under the most favorable instances, and it is in order for some one to make a new suggestion.

Safeguarding the Life of the Individual

The guarantee of our community to look after the lives of its members was emphasized the other day when a New York physician, in the course of an argument, announced that, under certain circumstances, he would be willing to submit to vivisection. The authorities at once made the following statement: "In case the doctor's offer should be accepted and he should really undergo an operation, we could do nothing to prevent, for it would be legally merely a misdemeanor. But if the doctor should die under the operation every one concerned in the case, active participants, counsellors, any one who advised, aided or abetted the act, would be liable to prosecution for manslaughter and would be punished according to law, no matter what his position might be." The case again draws attention to the fact that the individual has no legal right to say whether he shall live or not live. Suicide in any form is a crime. The life of the individual belongs to the State and is to be protected even against himself. The question of putting to death incurable patients was started in this country not long ago by a Southern doctor announcing that such an act had more than the element of mercy in it. The Solons of the world think differently and at this stage of the world's civilization their views strongly prevail as was evidenced recently in the Saxon Parliament. A bill was introduced by a set of persons calling themselves "humanitarians" to permit doctors to put to death at their requests patients whose recovery was hopeless. The measure was quickly killed. The principal arguments in opposition were directed against the clause protecting the doctors from legal complications if they arranged such a taking off for their patients. The London Spectator summed them up as follows: "As a rule, with few exceptions, doctors are good people; but there are many of them and some must be bad. To give a legal right to administer poison on demand without responsibility would be to arm every profligate heir with a dangerous weapon. Who is to tell after death whether the patient has consented to his own death, or whether the last ray of hope of saving his life had really disappeared or not? It would be bad enough if such things were suspected, as they would be by the suspicious; but the suspicion might be justified once and that once would destroy a confidence which does much to diminish in households the miserable impact of disease. Every patient of wealth would ask himself if there could be any one with an interest for putting him out of the way. Kings and great leaders of parties would have special reason for fear, and what the great apprehend, the little soon believe to be a possibility, vide the whole history of the Middle Ages, when all who were great expected assassination, and all who were little, if the great died inconveniently, howled out charges of poison. It is not well, for the sake of the class itself, to trust the power of life and death to any class which of necessity must exercise it in secret. It may be said that the power is trusted now and so it is, but with the usual guarantees, and this additional one, that the rule of the profession is to preserve life while they can." It will be a long while before the so-called "humanitarians" will be able to batter down these reasons for safeguarding the individual.

The Perennial Stimulant Question

Another of that conscientious brigade of centenarians has broken out in the newspapers with the boast he has attained one hundred and seven years of life and joy because he has never smoked, chewed or drunk fiery liquors. His name is John Barlow and his voice is lifted from Oak Ridge, New York. Mr. Barlow differs in a degree from his aged mates in that he claims that he has never had a toothache and that no maker of liver pills has ever received a cent of his money. Centenarian Barlow doesn't openly assert that the non-use of whisky and tobacco has protected his liver and teeth from their fell destroyers, but his enthusiastic friends do and they furthermore insist that good man Barlow would have died decades ago had he trifled with the pleasures of tobacco and drink. How many honest souls have fought, wrangled and lost their good tempers over this old, old question. Hale, hearty and cheerful persons have reached the century mark without the use of tobacco and strong drink, and fellows of their physical and mental trim have used them to a moderate degree and jogged serenely over the same mark. The abstemious centenarians are not so numerous, or at least are not so often heard from. This to the superficial investigator proves at once that whisky and tobacco are allies of longevity. The truth is that most people who climb beyond the proverbial three score and ten start in the race so well equipped physically that only a sledge hammer fiercely wielded in place of a reaper will carry them off. This much discussed question has no chance of being settled because it possesses one vital point that can never be determined, and that is there is no way of showing that a man who used whisky and tobacco and lived to be one hundred years old might not have lived one hundred and fifty if he had never used those stimulants. Then again, nobody will ever be able to satisfactorily demonstrate that men like Barlow would have died before fifty had they used tobacco and whisky. This old-time question may yield some service by being given to fledgling school debaters to wrangle over but no one else will be able to get any profit out of it in these strenuous days.

The Saunterer

Reincarnated Angels

Since the development of Colonizer Harris' scheme at Santa Rosa and the flight of his awakened "gods and goddesses" to the four quarters of the globe no plan of a "new life" has attracted more attention here than the transforming of "Babs" resort on the ocean beach into an earthly home for "reincarnated angels." Those who are acquainted with the arch-priestess, Mrs. Ida Evelyn Russell, are not surprised at her success. There is no doubt that Mrs. Drexler with her two millions is the real "angel" of the new company, according to theatrical interpretation, for it is her money that makes the "wheels go round." But opinion is divided as to the effect of the wonderful influence Mrs. Russell has over her half-dozen converts. Some of those who have come into closer contact with their home than the Bulletin reporter who managed to wriggle into the carefully guarded place, declare that Mrs. Russell is an unknown power for good in the community. An enthusiastic woman who has had business relations with the unusual household, asserts that it is indeed "heaven on earth."

Do their Share of Drudgery

The people whose identity the daily papers have been unable to discover are a young woman who formerly taught in the Alameda schools, her married sister and husband, who is connected with one of the Henry Crocker companies, and another young woman employed by the same firm. "There is never an unkind word spoken there," says my sympathizing informant, "and Dame Gossip has to pack her things and roost elsewhere. It is true the house is beautifully furnished and that Mrs. Russell encourages the women to look their best. They always wear tea gowns in the house—simple house dresses for morning wear and very elaborate tea gowns for dinner. But nothing has been said of the work. Mrs. Russell says she believes that every one should do his or her share of menial labor so that those ground down by drudgery may have a chance to expand and put forth finer blossoms. A cook and maid are employed by the new society but every member of the household has appointed tasks, sharing even a part of the cooking and dishwashing, and thus giving the servants leisure to develop their higher qualities."

Mrs. Drexler's Ambition

The same admirer of the new colony declares that "Mrs. Russell employs a trained nurse who ministers to the indigent sick, and the nurse is supplied with the medicines and luxuries that coax back health. I know of a case," she said, "where a man who had been peculiarly unfortunate in business was loaned several thousand dollars by Mrs. Russell to help him jolt over the rough places to competency. No interest was charged and no capitulation to her cult demanded. The man and his family are not, and never have been members of her household. In fact they do not know just what the beliefs of the sect are. In all my own dealings with Mrs. Russell she has never attempted my conversion. Mrs. Drexler herself once candidly told me that she wanted to do the greatest possible good with the great wealth bequeathed her, and she looked to Mrs. Russell to help her distribute her largess wisely. It is Mrs. Russell's idea to employ a trained nurse for the poor and seek out individual cases worthy of help. Mrs. Drexler's money makes this possible."

Will it End in the Old Way?

Harris is now living in sumptuous ease in New York off the enormous profits of his Santa Rosa colony scheme, and there are those who prophesy that in the near future Mrs. Russell herself will be living in splendor off the money contributed by her present converts. The converts, however, are well acquainted with the charges of selfishness made against Mrs. Russell but to date all of them, and Mrs. Drexler most of all, have deep faith in the sincerity of her teachings. As for the physical operation they are said to undergo, my informant says she is not qualified to deny the report; "but," she declares, "if you saw the married ones, happy, normal couples, you'd have to doubt it."

When Mrs. Russell was a Girl

An old schoolmate of Mrs. Russell, by the way, is now paying a short visit to her ranch in California. This is Mrs. Richardson Clover, wife of the military attache at the U. S. Embassy in London. Mrs. Clover (then Dora Miller) was a pupil at the "select" school kept by Miss Prince which Mrs. Russell (then Ida Connor) attended. The latter was by no means so highly situated socially as the other girls who attended the school. Dora Miller's father was a U. S. Senator. The Callaghan girls were daughters of a wealthy citizen and their home in Eddy street was then one of the handsomest in San Francisco. Mamie Toy was a sister of George Toy, now of Bovee, Toy & Co. The other girls—there were not more than a dozen in the school—were all of like social status. But Ida Connor's mother kept a boarding-house—and not a Salisbury boarding-house, either. Still Ida had the "way wiz her" that made friends and she was very popular among her aristocratic school fellows. Teachers of the old Pine and Larkin primary school are raking up their recollections of Mrs. Russell, when she was a little tot in short skirts and her hair hanging down her back. They say she had "hypnotic power" even then, for she always had a string of little girls following her and carrying her books, as if she were a princess.

Gay Demeanor is the Thing Now

The repose of Vere de Vere is no longer the proper thing in New York demeanor, if Mrs. Oelrichs may be taken as a criterion. She is all life and animation, whether the occasion is a concert party or a luncheon. She is really Gallic in her facial play and gesture. Mrs. Oelrichs has quite lost her figure and grows more and more in build like her mother, the late Mrs. Theresa Fair. However, the resemblance ceases there, for "Tessie" has retained her clear white skin and her delicacy of feature. Somebody in commenting on Mrs. Oelrichs at the Mardi Gras ball said that she was not so pretty as her sister, Mrs. Vanderbilt. Now, except the Sunday Supp. writers, who call everybody a beauty whose lingerie and dots they are called on to describe, nobody was ever so obtuse as to dub Birdie Fair a beauty. She has lovely, soft, dark eyes and a sweet mouth, but her nose is impossible. There are noses slightly tip-tilted like the poet's flower-petals, but Mrs. Vanderbilt's is not that kind. Her sister's features are absolutely classic.

Mrs. Fair's Business Foresight

If Mrs. Oelrichs fulfills her intention and builds her Nob Hill hotel, she will be following closely in the footsteps of her mother, who built the Bella Vista for Mrs. Volney Spaulding. Mrs. Fair was a firm believer in improved real estate and especially did her financial instinct incline to the family hotel as a means of income. She showed keen foresight. If Mrs. Fair were living now she would be able to say, "I told you so," with regard to the present popularity of the family hotel.

Mrs. De La Montagne's Ultimatum

No wonder that Josephine Drexel, Elizabeth Rensen, Eloise Breese, Miss De Forest, Miss Callender and others of New York's rich bachelor maids cling to their single state when so many of their married friends are seeking to throw off their irksome bonds. The little rift within the lute of the Ernest de la Montagne household has been widening for some time, within full view of an interested audience of family friends. It was when Mrs. de la Montagne was abroad that her husband began to be talked about in connection with the wife of a Philadelphia stock broker. Last summer his attentions were offered and accepted so boldly that the prudes of the Quaker city went from whispers to loud talking, which finally reached the ears of the absent wife on the other side of the ocean. Not since the Borrowe-Astor and Sloane-Vanderbilt affairs had the tabbies been given such a chance to wag their tongues, and they embraced the opportunity with alacrity.

Reason of Her Resolve

Mrs. de la Montagne possesses all the spirit and resolution that have made the Hastings family, from which she sprang, such notable Californian examples. She would not let her dignity be compromised. Immediately she placed the alternative before her husband of choosing between her and his Quaker friend. It was an ultimatum. But her husband, who comes of fiery and headstrong French stock, refused to be dictated to with regard to his choice of feminine friends. His wife's reply was to announce her intention of visiting her mother, Mrs. John A. Darling, in California for awhile and then to go to Newport, to take up a legal residence with view of suing for a divorce.

His Former Love

The social prominence of the couple renders their domestic squabble of public interest. Nobody takes much notice of its cause beyond wondering what the Quaker lady's husband is going to do in the affair. His wife is accused of nothing worse than folly, so far as present rumors go. De la Montagne has only lately deserted horses to take up the pursuit of Venus. A few years ago his whole heart, aside from his wife and son, was devoted to the race course. They used to say then that his business when in the judge's stand was largely that of introducing the champagne imported by his father's house.

What will Mamma Advocate?

Society here is interested to know what Mrs. Darling will do in the way of advising her daughter. Mrs. Darling was never an approver of divorces. Like Lady de Bohun, in Basil King's novel that lately stirred up New York and London and caused them to fall a-guessing about the heroes' and heroines' identity, Mrs. Darlig has always said: "'There is only one safe condition for a woman * * * to be either single, married or a widow. To be divorced is nothing at all. For a free woman with a husband, or a free man with a wife, there is no place * * *. Their footing is uncertain; and in human society, when once your footing is uncertain, you are as good as lost. * * * There is only one course for a woman who has divorced a husband; it is to marry again. * * * A single woman may stay single; a widow may prefer a state of widowhood; but the divorced woman must go on. * * * As soon as she has lost one man's protection she must get under another's." Clara Hastings Catherwood was a widow herself when she married Major Darling. Her daughter, Jennie Catherwood, Mrs. de la Montagne's sister, is said to be very happy with her husband, Dr. Morton Grinnell, and delights to assist him in his literary labors.

After Eight Years

More closely home comes the news of Mrs. Duke Farnsworth Baxter's application for divorce. It seems scarcely eight years, though it is fully that, since Hilda Macdonald married Luke Baxter and went South to live. After about two years' residence there she returned here about the time her brother Burns married Bessie Younger. Colonel Macdonald, their father, it will be remembered, married his stenographer, a cultured and clever Jewish girl. This second marriage was happy, and so has been that of his son. Only pretty Hilda found her marital ties galling and has finally decided to throw them off.

End of the "Plug Cut" Wedding

Right on top of the talk of the De la Montagne separation came Mrs. Suffern Tailer's arrival at the Cataract hotel, Sioux Falls, which was of course immediately wired across the continent. As South Dakota is rarely visited save by would-be divorcees, the inference naturally comes of itself. I remember well when Maude Lorillard married T. Suffern Tailer. The Astor set called it "the Plug Cut wedding," and said it was absurd that the children of two retired American tradesmen should be married in such style, as if they were sprigs of nobility. The wedding was solemnized in Calvary church, New York, on a dark and stormy day. The superstitious ones who were present shook their heads and said, "Blessed is the bride that the sun shines on." They can revive their gloomy predictions now that a divorce is talked of.

When Love Dies Out

But sunshine or not, Suffern Tailer was a most jubilant looking bridegroom and walked out of church with a proud and happy air. There seemed no reason on earth why the prince and princess should not have lived happily ever after, with their mutual love of life and horses and sports and no dissimilar tastes. But evidently, to quote Lady de Bohun again: "Love is like a garment. When it is new we wear it wth pleasure. When it has lost its freshness we wear it still—but with less pride. When it is old we twist it and turn it and try to make it serve some useful end. But a day comes round when we are tired to death at the sight of it, and are glad to give it away." When the Suffern Tailers visited San Francisco, not long after their marriage, love was burning brightly, but nearly nine years have passed since then.

Not up on Lingerie

When Rear Admiral Schley visited Nashville last week the committee in charge of his reception telegraphed to their Congressman, John W. Gaines, at Washington, for information regarding the proper salutes and other honors to be accorded him. Mr. Gaines went to the Navy Department, got the information, and wired back to the committee at Nashville:

"Give him a salute of thirteen guns, with two ruffles and flourishes."

Of course this meant the "ruffle of the drums" and the "flourish of the trumpets." The Nashville people, though, puzzled over the despatch with knitted brows, trying to solve the problem. Then they wired back:

"What do you mean by ruffles and flourishes? We are not up on that kind of lingerie."

The monocle fad is on its way west, according to London and New York experts, and it won't be long before we see them flashing on Market street.

Perils of "Larks" in Washington

My Washington correspondent writes me that one or two episodes in which young and inexperienced girls have been deplorably prominent have opened the eyes of a good many people to the fact that too much champagne is frequently consumed at the society functions. One of these young girls has just been sent to her home in the far West as a result of her indiscretion. It happened at an afternoon reception given by the wife of a foreign diplomat. After all the other guests had departed a wrap belonging to the Western girl was found in the dressing room. The hostess, suspecting that something was wrong, instituted a search and the girl was found in the billiard room on the top story. She was hopelessly intoxicated. Her relatives were summoned at once and the girl was put to bed. On regaining consciousness the girl was put to shame and told the story. A dapper young foreign scoundrel had smuggled several bottles of champagne under his coat and induced her to go to the billiard room with him "just for a lark." Just about the time the guests began to leave she felt the first symptoms of intoxication. The young foreigner became alarmed at her condition and hurriedly left.

Dowagers Roused to the Dangers

The staid dowagers who direct Society are considering the necessity of adopting measures to prevent such incidents. As it is girls of little or no experience come from their quiet homes and are suddenly thrown into contact with the dissipation and free-and-easy conditions of life at the Capital. Foreign diplomats and attaches in their gorgeous uniforms dazzle such inexperienced persons. A waltz or two aggravates their excited condition, and often what begins in a harmless flirtation leads to some madcap freak which brings them perilously close to disgrace. It is to remedy all this that the dowagers are now in consultation.

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst has just sold her magnificent home in Washington to the Italian Ambassador, Signor des Planches. This means that hereafter she will not spend so much of her time in the East.

Figured on the Divorce

Oakland, which is so terribly proper sometimes, took kindly to Mr. Frank Moulan, and did not make any malapropos remarks about marital experiences within his hearing or that of Maude Berri, his handsome wife. However, I am told that Chicago and New York people have not yet figured out who is entitled to write herself Mrs. Moulan. After Maude Berri Fisher and the Castle Square tenor celebrated their wedding, the former Mrs. Moulan, from whom the bridegroom thought he had been legally freed, had him haled into court for bigamy. Thence he went to jail, but Maude Berri's liberality soon provided the wherewithal for his release. Possibly it was all quietly arranged later, though no word of such arrangement has appeared in the press despatches. But Moulan came out here with the prima donna of Kirk La Shelle's company, and was presented to her family and a select few of her friends as her husband. He was a guest at the supper Billy Foote gave on Shrove Tuesday night in honor of Maude Berri. Most of those there had known her former husband, Frank Fisher, but none made any invidious comparisons between the two men. Dr. Fisher was a devoted husband, but he died just as his wife was on the threshold of stage success.

Enter the Matron-of-Honor

Georgie Hopkins, after the manner of the other up-to-date brides, is to have a matron-of-honor for her wedding. Her sister, Edna Hopkins Taylor, will have the part. Mary Scott Martin acted in that capacity for her chum Caro Crockett. East and West the matron-of-honor is now the proper adjunct of all swell weddings. Her duties are manifold and delicate. She it is who writes the nice little letters to the bride's dear personal friends, telling them all about the engagement and hinting at the time of the wedding, with other interesting and important details. She it is who hovers like a guardian angel around the happy couple, relieving them of every embarrassment and making the path toward the altar smooth and easy (and if she possesses tact and knows her business she will never be too present, but always just present enough). At the ceremony it is the matron of honor who, after superintending the arrangements of the wedding presents and the last touches to the bride's toilet, takes the place next behind the bridesmaids in the wedding procession to the altar, and in every respect fills the position of "best woman" to her interesting charge.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

Prefers Sculpturing to Society

Sadie Whitney has evidently no intention of changing her condition in spite of that engagement she entered into while in Paris. At least she says nothing about getting married to anybody and seems wholly wedded to her art. She has a studio in Clay street up many flights of stairs and there she wields the knife and molds the pliant clay from early morn until dewy eve, or until she gets ready to catch the boat that will bring her home in time for dinner. Miss Whitney is very enthusiatic over her art and seems determined to go ahead and become a sculptor in dead earnest. Society no longer appears to have any charms for her. She is at present busy upon the bust of a Bohemian club member and has some other casts under way.

Mr. McKnight had Josef Hofmann out in an Oldsmobile the other day. Young Hofmann is an expert automobilist and an enthusiast. The Park Commission granted him a special permit to go on the south drive.

Why the Curate was Dismissed

The craze for athletics has taken such a hold on the world that it is not at all surprising to find amongst the qualifications for servants advertised for in the English papers a knowledge of tennis, cricket or some other out-door game, but it is a little staggering to read of the excuse given by an Anglican clergyman for dismissing his curate. Though the assistant was acknowledged to be unexceptional in other respects, he did not come up to the requirements as a cricketer, and his vicar felt compelled to part with him, declaring that "what this parish really needs is a good, fast bowler, with a break from the off." No doubt the worthy vicar was wise in his generation.

Their Auto Ran into Cocktails

Several moonlight automobile rides are being planned to relieve the monotony of Lent—providing the weather prophet is propitious. The last time Lady Moon was "full" a merry crowd of society people took advantage of her condition and enjoyed a trip to the Cliff and supper. The machine was a rented one, and somewhere near the Panhandle began to kick up lively didoes, sending the girls and the chaperon into seriocomic hysterics. The amateur chaffeur, who knows more about cotillons than mechanical stunts, couldn't make the auto's insides behave, so there was nothing for it but to leave the "mobe," foot back to the Casino and telephone for carriages. The chaperon was very much perturbed over taking her charges to a resort frequented by wine-bibbers, but she wouldn't court neuralgia waiting "on the benches in the park" for carriages. The girls thought it a jolly lark and one of them deposed the polite Boniface who holds up the bar and proceeded to prove her own skill as a mixicologist. Those present evidently found her cocktails to taste and the chaperon was very much relieved when the carriages arrived.

Did she Give him a Love Philter?

It is whispered that a gilded youth who has for some time been dallying his devoirs at the shrine of a belle declared himself then and there and the engagement will be publicly anounced at the next smart wedding where the young lady herself officiates as bridesmaid. Some one has been unkind enough to hint that the cocktail she mixed the evasive youth was really a love philter that brought him to time. If so we should like to have her send the recipe to this office C. O. D—P. D. Q., as we know several other young ladies in the smart set who could use it.

Ethyl Hager will Lead the "Autos"

Alec Tobin, Eugene Murphy and Laurance Scott are about the only society chaffeurs who are keen enough about the sport to own automobiles, so they will be counted upon for the Lenten rides. Sara Drum is the only girl in the smart set who has her own "mobe" and she handles it like a veteran. Ethyl Hager has already ordered one and a very smart affair it promises to be, made in her own colors. It is purposed to include automobile races at the September meet in Monterey. At the Newport races there were ladies' entries so there is no reason why the fair sex should not have a try-out of skill at Monterey. Miss Drum, Miss Hager and two or three other girls who know how to handle "mobes" could put the men on their mettle.

"They say Mamie's twice as happy since her divorce."
"She ought to be. Her husband used to allow her $30 a month for spending money; now he has to give her $60 in alimony."

Both Girls are Kept Talking

It's like taking a trip abroad to call at the Palace these days. With Addie Murphy and Mamie Josselyn both staying there, it's an easy jump from London to Paris and no mal de mer. The Josselyns spent most of their time in England while Mrs. Murphy and Addie lingered longest in Paris. Both girls would probably enjoy a visit to the deaf and dumb institute for they are being questioned to death.

"What did you discuss at the club today, dear?"
"Oh, we didn't get any further than the characters of the women who want to be president."

She will come home to her Mother

Mrs. Ernest de la Montagne will shortly arrive in San Francisco and will probably spend most of her time with her mother at the family ranch near Napa. Mrs. Darling is not nearly so fluttered over the approaching divorce as was expected by those who know her ideas on the subject. "We've got divorce in the family," she said tartly, to an Aunty Doleful, "but then there are worse things—locomotor ataxia, for instance." As two near relatives of the lady with the crocodile tear habit have died from that dread disease the arrow pierced the mark. At the time of Mrs. Darling's own divorce from her first husband, there was a great amount of speculation as to whether she would ever commit matrimony again. It was generally believed that as she was a Catholic and a divorcee she would have to be content with grass widowhood. When Mrs. Catherwood's engagement to Mayor Darling was announced, she happened to overhear some friends discussing her second dive into unsounded waters. "I owe it to mankind," she calmly announced, "it wouldn't be right to go to my grave thinking marriage is a failure without giving it a second trial."

Flight of the Hastings' Clan

From all appearances this second venture has been a success and wiped out the bitter taste left by the first mistake. Mrs. Darling's sister is also a divorcee and has resumed her maiden name, carding herself Mrs. Hastings. In the elder days of San Francisco society no social affair had the right flavor unless the Hastings' were represented. They were the vanilla of society. But of late years they have scattered here, there and everywhere with only occasional jaunts to San Francisco. When the Hastings' home in Sutter street was sold to the Century club people felt that the last anchorage that held them here as residents was swept away.

Another Family Tragedy

When a well-known clubman, with an uncontrolable taste for country sports, started eastward some weeks ago to meet his charming wife, who had been traveling along the Atlantic seaboard for several months visiting friends, those who had prophesied an estrangement in the family admitted their error and ceased to gossip. Later, however, it was discovered that on the same train with her, but not in the same car, was the gentleman who had been reported in her company traveling between certain well-known Eastern cities. Forthwith the tongues began the wag again and this time to a still more unpleasant tune. Her fortune is said to be still very large. "Mari complaisant," the gossips say, and shrug their shoulders. Others declare this is only the first act in another family tragedy.

Gertrude Elliott Scoring a Success

A Californian in London writes me: "But two things are on the public tongue just now—the Coronation and the Smallpox scare. Everybody is being vaccinated and everybody is preparing for the fete. The King and Queen appeared for the first time in public at the production of Madeline Lucette Ryley's 'Mice and Men,' played by Gertrude Elliott and her husband. Gertrude became a mother not long ago, and the maternal look adds greatly to her beauty. She is a big favorite in London. Maxine was not a success in the Goodwins' last play. Just to show how queer the British public is, I must tell you that though Goodwin's play had fine notices it was not a success. Now, Gillette in 'Sherlock Holmes' was roasted to pieces by the press, yet it is still playing to enormous business. Gillette is the social lion of the hour. Alice Neilsen made her debut in concert Shrove Tuesday at Albert hall. Another American, Bernice Carew, a pupil of Bohuy in Paris, has arrived in town and will give her concert at St. James' under the protection of our Ambassador.

Mr. Keppel's New Honor

"Mr. George Keppel has been appointed master of the Stables to His Majesty, King Albert, and the latter has set aside for him a suite of apartments directly opposite the Buckingham Palace. All courts are hereafter to be held at night, and we shall be quite gay. London is to have a National theatre and the good old stock days will return. Plays will then be the things instead of the milliners' exhibit and the walking dressmakers' signs.' We are to have English opera, too. Royalty will patronize the arts now and where it goes the faithful sheep will follow."

"Hello, Glumley, out walking for your health?"
"Yes, I'm going to the doctor's."

Grant an Admirer of Female Beauty

The pretty wife of a member of the Cosmos club tells the story on Hugh Grant, who some of the papers seem to think knows more of the Nora Fuller case than he is willing to confess. "I was walking along the street with my husband one day," she said, "when a man on a passing car started in to stare at me. He was rubbering for all he was worth when all at once the car gave a jerk and presto! he fell flat in the street. It occurred so suddenly that my husband and I laughed aloud. The incident was brought to my mind the other day when I saw Grant's picture in the paper. 'I seem to know that face,' I said to my husband. 'Of course you do!' he answered; 'that's the man that admired you so much that he had a fall in consequence.'"

Important results are expected from the meeting of representative Democrats from thirty-eight States of the Union at the Manhattan club, New York, on Washington's Birthday. Leaders of the party regard this as the first step toward organization for the maintenance of the fundamental principles of the Democracy.

Paris Shocked by the "Rastas"

My Paris correspondent writes me that certain "Kings in Exile" there are again causing a deal of comment on account of their disgraceful ways. The French have a phrase for the foreigner who comes to Paris simply because he believes that that alluring city offers more numerous, safer and worse opportunities for self-indulgence of mere vicious inclination than any other place in the world. The boulevardiers call him a "rasta-quouere" or "rasta" for short. It is notorious fact that the worst "rastas" of Europe are either reigning or dethroned monarchs. There is one king in particular who, the very day he comes to Paris, finds no better place to amuse himself than the Moulin Rouge—a ghastly hole where all that is lowest and most debased in the life of Paris, male and female, nightly congregate. You can not go to any race-course in Paris without seeing the paddock crowded with a dozen of foreign princes, Russian grand-dukes, German princelings and the like. King Milan of Servia was regarded with something like horror even among the decadents in such capitals as

Imprisoned for Wooing a Princess

Just now the Continental papers are full of two court scandals which are colored with as much of squalor as if they were enacted in an East-side den. They remind one of that awful tragedy which involved the shocking deaths of the Austrian Crown Prince and of the poor, beautiful young woman whose body was found beside his and whose corpse was hurried off to a funeral as furtive and obscure as that of a wretched pauper One of these latter tragedies began a few years ago, when a young Austrian lieutenant was suddenly seized on the charge of forging bills in the name of the Archduchess Stephanie, widow of the Crown Prince. He is still the inmate of a military prison and is intercommunicado. The charge is generally believed to have been trumped up in order to get rid of him because he had been the friend and confidant of the reigning Princess This Princess, the daughter of a well-known monarch, was about the same time placed in a lunatic asylum. Of course she receives the very best of care and attention, but there are those who claim that she is no more demented than the young lieutenant is guilty of forgery The whole story is like one of those founded on the lettre-de-cachet, so frequently used by influential persons during the time of the Bastile to put inconvenient people out of the way.

Tragedy of a Bob-Tail Hunter

Mr. Emil Fischer, diamond expert and equestrian, will not bestride his bob-tailed, bottle-nosed sorrel at the opening meet of the San Rafael Hunt club in April. The horse was a beauty. He might have been considered by the unknowing either a cob, hack, jade, palfrey, hunter, jument, pony, galloway, pad, sheltie, steed, barb or punch, but to his admiring owner he was the gem of the genus equine. Pending the opening of the hunting season in San Rafael he was given the run of the low lands below that delightful burg in order to bring up his magnificent form to the top racing standard. This mettlesome horse met his fate in company of San Rafael warriors, whose achievements are part of the history of the State. They compose Company D, Fifth Regiment, N. G. C. The chief excellency of the company is its proficiency in markmanship. A few weeks ago Captain Cheda, First Lieutenant Smith, Second Lieutenant Hawkins and Private Martinelli, the last-named ex-district attorney of the county, repaired to the "flats" to indulge in target practice. Directly after the first fusillade rang out came a squeal of pain from an oblique point, and to the amazement of the soldiers, Fischer's horse was discovered out over the flats writhing in his death agony.

Plans a Wholesale Revenge

No one knew who fired the fatal shot. After a hasty counsel of war it was decided to send out a funeral detail and give the famous hunter proper burial. Prompt action would serve two purposes. First, decent observance of established custom; and second, removal of evidence—corpus delicti—until such time as best suited the "marksmen" to divulge the tale. So the horse was quietly and silently buried. Of course Fischer soon discovered his loss, but no one could give him the faintest clue of when, where or how the nag had disappeared. Not till the day dawned, when the marksmen deemed it best to drop a hint, did Fischer get an inkling of the truth. The penitent marksmen offered him fifty dollars to wipe out the fatal score. Fischer scorned the offer. The marksmen tried to parley with him but Fischer had learned the details of the tragedy by this time and had worked himself into a rage worthy of Achilles. He determined his famous sorrel hunter should have revenge, so he has brought suit against Captain Cheda, First Lieutenant Smith, Second Lieutenant Hawkins and Private Martinelli for three hundred dollars in compensation of his great loss and to assuage his grief, etc. In his turn he proposes to pump them full of hot, scathing, bitter shot when the case comes up in court.

Gold and Silver Weddings

The golden wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. John F. Pope will be celebrated next Saturday afternoon with a reception at their home in Pine street. Mr. Pope is a pioneer of San Francisco. He was one of the earliest members of the Bohemian club, though he does not now belong to the organization. The Popes have three children, the eldest of whom, Overton C. Pope, is not married. Edith is Mrs. R. Beach and Kate, the elder daughter, married Mr. King, of the publishing house of King, Law & Co. Her home is in Chicago.

Last Saturday night, Mr. and Mrs. O. E. Pettis celebrated their silver wedding anniversary, many friends being present to congratulate them on their twenty-five years of wedded happiness.

When you ask for Jesse Moore Whisky be sure you get it. Don't let anyone tell you they have something just as good.

Society Doffing its Sombre Colors

People are growing acclimated to the non-wearing of the weeds when near relatives depart this world of life and color. At one time it was considered the thing to wear a long face and veil, even for one whose only good act in life was to die. Gradually it began to be accepted as unnecessary to mourn for those whose demise was a palpable good riddance. A Burlingame matron, whose brother recently died, is not conspicuously mourning. Perhaps the wild oats he sowed still stick in his family's crop and check their tears. His sister has not missed any of the smart affairs to which she is bidden, and was one of the handsomest gowned women at the Tobin dinner before the Mardi Gras.

Not Tempted by the Gown at All

But now it looks as though mourning "in toto," however dear the relationship, is doomed. Therese Morgan, whose father's death is daily expected, says she will don the gorgeous gowns given by Georgie Hopkins and act as her bridesmaid. Mr. Morgan's life is hanging by the slimmest thread and the shears seem ready to snap it any moment. He is delirious most of the time and it takes three attendants to hold him. The Morgan girls will hardly pioneer the breaking of the custom of not going into mourning, but even for Therese to serve as bridesmaid in gala attire with her father in such a condition is flying in the face of precedent. There are those who are foolish enough to say that the gratuitous gown is the bait that urges Miss Morgan. That is absurd on the face of it, for Miss Morgan can afford to buy her own clothes and, moreover, the gown will have to lie fallow for a year at least during which time fashion is bound to ring in new modes that will probably shelve it permanently, so it is nonsensical to dwell upon the dress question.

She is Sure to do the Proper Thing

Therese Morgan is an usually independent girl, has a will of her own, and wants to be bridesmaid at the Hopkins-McNear wedding. It is only conventionality that makes it a heinous crime for the family of the deceased to take an interest in life. Many are growing to believe that there is really no reason why a girl in mourning should not be a bridesmaid at a dear friend's wedding. Just the same society seems to be quite shocked at Miss Morgan's intention.

Slowboy—Here, Gayboy, take a couple of these tickets, will you? It's a raffle for a poor man.

Gayboy—No, thanks. I wouldn't know what to do with a poor man if I won him.

Gay Life of the Widower

There is nothing to exceed the gaiety of the widow except that of the divorce. I notice that the divorcee sometimes weeps while the divorce simply plunges into a life of gayety. The moment Jack Wilson was free he went rushing about like an enthusiastic debutante. Mrs. Avery McCarthy retired to Santa Barbara, completely unstrung by her suffering, but I saw Avery—who, before and during his married life was the most subdued of men—capering about gaily at the Mardi Gras in the costume of a clown.

Lured Her with his Soft Brown Eyes

Miss Beulah Stubbs has become the bride of her Reno beloved, and the Stubbs', after making many moans, gave her a wedding in Chicago. Young John Sunderland has brown eyes to make a young girl lie awake nights. Miss Beulah, while visiting her uncle's family at the Reno University, fell under the spell of them and was never the same again. John's father keeps a shoe-store in Reno, but John ocupies himself with trying to look beautiful, and that worried the hustling and successful railroad manager. His daughter, however, declared she wanted him even if she had to live in Reno, which would appear to some to be a heroic test of affection.

Don Jose—The easiest way to win a woman's love is to give her all the money she wants."

Don Caesar—In that case bankers are Cupid's brokers."

A Wealthy House Divided Against Itself

The O'Connors are all divided up and living at different hotels. Lillie and Willie are at the Palace and Belle and Tiny are at the Richelieu. All the girls are against Lillie and Willie, for Lillie is the executor of the estate. "Con" O'Connor left his property in trust, and the younger girls tried unsuccessfully to break the trust. Lillie has no business ability, and sold the house that cost her father forty-five thousand dollars for twenty thousand. Willie is said to be so incorrigible that the Mardi Gras committee refused him an invitation to the ball, but favored by Lillie, as only brothers usually are by their elder sisters. She lent him all sorts of money when she came into power and took his I. O. U.'s as security. These turned out to be nothing but waste paper, as he was not of age when he signed them. The O'Connor girls are pretty and stylish, and it seems strange none of them marries. But they are such brisk, keen talkers that perhaps they frighten away the average masculine.

Mrs. De Young Wins an Honor

Mrs. M. H. de Young has been appointed on the board of lady managers at the coming World's Fair in St. Louis. This is no small honor for the committee has sought the most representative women of the various sections of the United States. With Mrs. de Young will serve women like Helen Gould and Mrs. Potter Palmer. The selection of Mrs. de Young as the Pacific Coast representative is a happy choice for she is well equipped to serve in such capacity. She took a lively interest in the Midwinter Fair, which was one of her husband's pet projects, and knows just how to go about such things. It was hoped that the De Youngs would return before Lent so that Helen's local debut would not be nipped in the bud. She had not yet really come out when she was whisked off to Europe and now she will have to wait another season before the grand ball will launch her as a charming debutante.

Ready for the Spreckels Gay Bal Masque

The Misses Spreckels have lived up to their friends' expectations and are going to give a big dance on Mi-Careme. The cards read "Bal Masque," which means that the ball room will be a sight for jaded optics. The girls are getting costumes that would have been beyond their wildest dreams a few seasons ago. Then all one had to do to be de rigueur was to stick the head in the flour barrel, invest in five cents' worth of black court plaster and give an imitation of Little Willie after using papa's razor. A black velvet ribbon and a medallion was a happy touch but not imperative. Ah, la, la, la, those were good old days when pa wasn't so rich and ma still hankered for boarders. But the grass is pretty long now and people the spending dollars where before nickels sufficed. The few spectacularly rich have not grown poorer and the rank and file in society are notched up several spaces in Bradstreet. Real lace is now worn sub rosa, in fact, turn Society wrong side out and you'd find the inner wrappings gilt-edge as the binding. There was an economical time when people would not spend money on fancy dress because it could not do every-day duty afterwards. Now no one minds a little things like that.

Gay Gowns will be There

The modistes are given full swing and let the tight-o-maniacs worry over such trifles as spending a miniature mint on a fancy dress. There are going to be some smashing, original gowns at the Spreckels' ball—a genuine bal masque, not merely a poudre. The girls have tried to hit on new characters and while there are bound to be the ubiquitous "Folly's" and flower-girls, most of the costumes are out of the stereotyped. The invitations read, "Please present this card before ten," so the guests are bound to get there before the milkman. The trouble with the Greenway cotillons and all the balls, in fact, that are not distinctly "small and early's" is that half the night is fidgeted away waiting for the other half of the guests to arrive. The Spreckels' house will be thrown open to its full capacity and youth and pleasure will hold high carnival.

How She Told the Secret

Mrs. Edward Hopkins' luncheon Wednesday is the first affair of its kind she has given in many years. Four years ago, while trimming a Christmas tree, she suddenly became speechless. The doctors have been unable to explain the malady except from over-excitement. Mrs. Hopkins' left side was paralyzed. She has been gradually recovering her speech until now she can utter several words. Her family is extremely devoted to her and she communicates with them by pencil and paper. When she was first taken ill a neighbor went to see Mrs. Hopkins and thought, as the latter could not talk, that it was quite safe to tell her the news of a secret engagement. It did not occur to her to ask Mrs. Hopkins not to repeat it, for she thought she could not. After the visitor was gone Mrs. Hopkins gesticulated the secret engagement to the next visitor and so the news was spread.

Luring her back to Liveliness

I hear that Florence Breckenridge still has one foot in the Slough of Despond. At one time it was reported that she was blithe and debonair as of old, but evidently she had slipped deeper into melancholy than even her relatives imagined. Florence Breckenridge's chief charm lay in her eyes—not such wonderfully pretty eyes in shape or color, but full of witchery—eyes that had a tantalizing language of their own. It was hard to imagine these eyes looking straight ahead as though seeing nothing but darkness and despair. Yet, before she went away, Florence would sit for hours with gloom written on her brow and misery in her eyes. She has fortunately been shaken out of this apathetic condition, but she still gets those "mopey" feelings that do not belong to her years.

Frank Unger's New Vocation

A New York correspondent writes me that the realm of art has been invaded by Frank Unger, who has been doing come remarkably fine work in the illumination line. The erstwhile major-domo of the Gilligs never thought he had artistic talent until lately. Just pour passer le temps he tried his hand at illuminating some books, and his success emboldened him to go on. He has done some charming things in water colors and others in black and white. Frank Unger is quite as versatile as his friend Joe Redding, and can talk, write, dance, sing and act with equal ease. He was always ready with his brush or crayon. It seems rather odd that his ex-wife, Minnie Buchanan, should also be artistic as well as literary. She married Arthur Jules Goodman, the artist, after her divorce from Unger.

He—Would you be satisfied to marry a man who did not own a big yacht?

She—Certainly, if he had a nice little smack.

Perhaps they Missed their Boat

There have been late arrivals at local concerts, but the banner for this sort of tardiness must be awarded a couple at the Nordica recital Monday night. The very last number was being awaited, when there entered a tall society girl in evening attire and her escort. He hurried up to an usher with his checks, but was evidently informed that the concert was nearly over. However, he was determined to seat his fair companion, therefore he escorted her down the central aisle, taking seats somewhere near the centre of the house. Nordica had begun the wonderful "Brunhilde's Call" by the time the nervous young man had divested his companion of her wrap; and before they were fully settled in their seats the number and the concert were ended.

Mrs. Langtry's New Play

Following in line with the actresses of her class Mrs. Langtry has had a playsmith manufacture a four-act drama for her having as the heroine a woman of "a characteristic type." She selected Mademoiselle Mars the famous French actress, whose star shone brightest in the Napoleonic period. The play is said to be slow and pulseless with simply a lay figure for the centre of the stage. Mrs. Langtry presents the part with a lavish display of gowns and jewels that has set London to talking. For stage purposes and so as not to completely destroy all sympathy with the lay figure heroine the story of the life of Mademoiselle Mars has been considerably altered and her character painted out in spots. In brief, the plot narrates how Mademoiselle Mars became enamored of a young Royalist, the Duc Aumont, and refused the proffered love of the embittered but ambitious Bonaparte, then an unknown lieutenant. Through her ingenuity and money both young men are enabled to escape from Paris when pursued by their political enemies.

Supped with Her at Last

Sixteen years later Napoleon, Emperor at last, is trying to get Mademoiselle Mars, now a famous actress, to consent to a tete-a-tete supper in a little apartment to which entrance is to be gained by a pass signed by himself. But she is still faithful to her Duke. Angered by her refusal Napoleon sends the pass and the invitation to a rival actress. Later somebody shows that Mademoiselle Mars and the Duke are mixed up in a Royalist plot. Napoleon promptly sends the Duke to prison and locks up the actress in her own home. But Mademoiselle Mars proves equal to the emergency. Through the heart-shaped sable muff, which is possessed by each actress, she regains possession of the magic pass, escapes from her confinement, scores a triumph at the theatre, suddenly appears before Napoleon and vanquishes him with her pleading and prayers. Again she refuses his invitation to supper unless the Empress is present as a chaperon. Finally the royal lover becomes conscience-stricken, forgives both her and the Duke, and caps his generosity by getting the Empress to invite them to dine en famille. The best that is said of the play is that Mrs. Langtry's dresses are ravishing.

Most Venal Beauty of Her Time

This is far from being the experience of Napoleon with the fickle and ambitious Mademoiselle Mars, as told by their biographer. Her parents were players and she went on the stage at fourteen when the French Revolution was at its height. In twenty months she won the coveted position of ingenue at the Comedie and for years enacted the sweet maiden of all the plays produced there. Off the stage she was the most fickle and most venal beauty of her time. All sorts of men fell victims to her charms and she—at once passionate and capricious, greedy and yet a spendthrift, mean and yet not without generous impulses—had that combination of qualities that drives lovers to drink, madness, physical and pecuniary ruin. At last she reached the summit of ambition of women of her type—she attracted the attention of Napoleon. The liaison was brief. Napoleon and the most illustrious actress of her time used to meet in a little bungalow at Rambouillet, one of the State residences of France. President Loubet shoots and entertains there a great deal now.

Gambled and Loved to the Last

After the Emperor passed on in his career Mademoiselle Mars continued to add to her triumphs and her bank account. Her collection of jewels became the most celebrated in Paris. However, her fame as the greatest actress of her time remained uneclipsed. She had the kind of old age one expects of her class. Deprived of the excitement of the stage she took to the stock exchange. She gambled heavily and lost heavily. Grown old, with dyed hair and bella donna eyes she became the puppet where she had so often been the tyrant and the curse; and was the creature of every handsome young man who attracted her vagrant fancy. And so she doddered on through old age. At the close it was discovered that she still had secreted away a very small portion of that wealth which she had schemed and played many parts to get.

ey to Spain in search of "local color" among the cigarette girls before appearing in that role, for I once had such a amusing letter on the subject. It was in San Francisco from a youth engaged as a "factory" hand, and he said: "One could really sympathize with Don Jose; ninety-nine men out of a hundred would have been bitten by a Carmen such as you; I might be the one-hundredth. I liked the way you finished your solos, didn't appeal for an encore from the gallery gods—though I, being one of them, would willingly have aided to get it. You have an immensity of magnetism; there is a don't-care about your movements, and you are yet so graceful that one must needs be reminded of a purring pussy cat."

"Are you coming to the rehearsal tonight?"
"I think I'll be too busy."
"You ought to; we're going to give that new hymn a trial."
"Well, I'm going to give a new him a trial myself."

"To Let" Signs on Gamblers' Doors

The sure thing men and the high-class gamblers are still holding back their investments in green-goods wares pending the report of the committee they have sent out to interview the gentleman who is supposed to be "next" to Mayor Schmitz. They don't want to spread their alluring golden bait till they are relieved of the police interference bogey. The gamblers in New York have already received their tip from the new powers and are going out of business. My New York correspondent writes that signs of a hard winter on the green cloth are thicker than storm signals flying from the weather station. The big poolrooms are closing out as rapidly as they can settle up their business. Frank Farrell, who cleaned up at least a half-million dollars under the last Tammany administration has discharged all his employes with a notice that he won't need their services till the end of Mayor Low's administration.

Tried to Form a Gambling Trust

One of the few poolroom men allowed to do business under Mayor Strong's term has told his men to look about till "the game" has changed. Gottfried Walbaum, who used to run the old Guttenberg race track and who was on the eve of opening magnificent poolrooms in the city, has dropped his plans and sailed for Europe. The inside take his action as a sure tip that poolrooms will not be permitted under the Low administration. Walbaum is said to stand in with the Republican organization and is credited with having cleaned up one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in bets on Low's election. The understanding now is that a limited number of clubrooms to which the general public is not admitted will be allowed to continue without police molestation. Syndicate gambling has ceased. An attempt was made to form a Republican organization to control gambling houses during the present administration but it was frowned upon and had to be abandoned. Instructions have been given to the police by Low's people to wage unceasing warfare upon the hand books as they are looked upon as being even more vicious in their effect than the poolrooms.

National Home for Newspapermen

The quarter of a million dollar Home for Journalists now seems an assured fact for the plans have been placed in the architect's hands. It is to be located at Orange, New Jersey, about an hour's ride from New York. The project is fathered by the International League of Press Clubs. At present the plan is not to make it a home for aged and broken down newspapermen but rather a health recruiting station where fagged out journalists can go and pull themselves together. That their recuperation may be complete an experienced corps of physicians, attendants, nurses and athletic trainers will be always at hand for service. There will be golf links, running tracks, tennis courts and all other forms of healthy outdoor sport with which the tired brain workers may amuse themselves. The only condition attached to admission will be a recommendation from any reputable editor or publisher. Encouragement will also be given newspaper men to go to the home and spend their vacations. One of the original methods of raising money for the scheme was the proposition to start a new magazine called Bohemia. Already a great number of contributions have been promised by prominent writers and illustrators and the monthly promises to start with a circulation of several hundred thousand copies. Through the profits of this venture the management hopes to secure a handsome sum for the endowment fund which is expected to support the institution. Of course the contributions which Carnegie and other capitalists have signified their intention of making will not be refused. The management, however will make every effort to have the fund supported by regular business ventures, such as the Bohemia magazine.

Showed Her Knowledge of Racing

The steeplechase was on when young Mrs. Blingum took her place in the grand stand.

"Charley, dear," she exclaimed, "there is no telling where in the world those horses are going next."

"Not unless you are familiar with the course."

"Why don't they run straight ahead?"

"Because it's not that kind of a race."

"Oh, I understand. This is one of those crooked races I have read so much about."

At Their Rainbow's End

The death of Mr. Macfarlane in Chicago must have been a frightful shock to his young bride, who was so far from her kith and kin. From the beginning of their courtship fate had been unkind to Miss Ballinger and her fiance. Flora Ballinger, although a young and very pretty girl, has never been sated with life's honey. Of good family, she has had to shoulder with the miscellaneous lot of bread winners who shoo the wolf from the door only by tireless energy. Miss Ballinger was an expert stenographer, and it was while engaged in that capacity at the California hotel that she first met Mr. Macfarlane. He offered her a better position in his bank at Honolulu, and as she has an invalid mother to support the offer was accepted. Mr. Macfarlane soon discovered that he took more than a platonic interest in his clever, pretty stenographer, and promptly declared his feelings. Although years older than Miss Ballinger, he proved an ardent wooer and soon won her consent. She left at once for San Francisco, showered with congratulations at winning the "catch" of Honolulu. An order for a beautiful trousseau was hurried through and an early marriage expected.

Why the Marriage was Delayed

But that was a year ago and the wedding bells only chimed for them last month. Rasping, tedious delays prevented Mr. Macfarlane leaving his business interests, and month after month his fiancee waited his coming. Mr. Macfarlane wanted to spend the honeymoon abroad and he would not come until he could snatch the necessary six months from his business. So a year went by and at least they were married, and never a couple's future seemed to stretch more rose-colored. But they found the end of the rainbow in Chicago, and instead of the fairy's pot of gold there was a cup of misery. Mr. Macfarlane was reputed very rich, but it is not known whether his affairs were straightened out and a will made.

Maude—So you're engaged. How long do you think it will last?

Fraudie—That's hard to tell. I don't know how much money he has saved up.

A Surprise behind the Sale of the Post

What a broad grin will spread over newspaper row when the story comes out of the way the Post was bought. If the big corporation at the head of it continues to handle its property in the same broad adroit way there isn't any doubt of the future success of the paper. Indeed, further assurance was given by the selection of Tom Garrett as publisher. He is a man of indomitable energy and one of the biggest hustlers in town for news. There is a barrel of money behind the present venture and before he signed the very nice contract he has in his inside pocket he obtained a cast-iron pledge that he would be given full swing to spend it where he thought investment would do the most good in lifting the paper. Under the last management the paper ran behind some seventy dollars a day. By increasing his editorial staff and other changes Publisher Garrett has already run the shortage over the one hundred dollars a day mark, but he doesn't flinch at that because he knows that by proper management the tide of increased business will set his way and soon begin to eat up the shortage. His confidence sits doubly easy because he feels sure that those behind him have the money and the tenacity to stay with the game till it reaches success. There isn't any doubt of the outcome, for this territory offers a good field for both evening papers and it is safe to say that both of them will keep climbing in circulation and business.

Promotion of A. M. Lawrence

The title of publisher is the new guerdon conferred on the most successful aspirant battling for position in the newspaper field. Under the new conditions he has full swing on the paper and controls both the editorial and the business departments. Tom Williams is virtually publisher of the Examiner, as S. W. Leake is on the Call. I hear that A. M. Lawrence is to be given that coveted position of the Chicago American. He certainly deserves it if anybody does, for he has worked strenuously and conscientiously in Mr. Hearst's interests and is one of the brainy captains who have helped most to advance the standard of the young Napoleon of the newspaper world.

"Maria, at last I think I've found the key to success."

"I hope so; but, remember, your weak point was always finding the keyhole."

How It's Done on the Stage

BY CARO ROMA

Place, a London theatrical agency. Time, noon, a summer's day. Persons: Miss Settled for Good, Mezzo; Miss Hard Worker, Soprano; Miss Inconstancy, Soubrette; Mr. Sour-Face, Theatrical Agent; Mr. Know-It-All, Manager; London's Great Composer, Conductor.

Mr. Sour Face seated at desk in his private office, writing.

Enters K. I. A. Hello, Face! I'm in a bad fix. Want a prima for that role—been all over this d—— town—can't find one. Fly-Away joins Isaacs; I've lost her. Next one must sing and act; salary no object; paid Fly-Away $100.

(Knock on the door is heard.)

Page (enters). Miss Settled-for-Good to see you, sir: won't keep you a minute. (Exits.)

K. I. A. Say, Face, just the woman! Ask her in—perhaps she'll do it.

S. F. (rings bell; Page enters). Tell her to come here. (Page exits.)

(Enters Miss S. F. G.) Good morning, Sour; why, how d'ye do, Mr. K. I. A. My! it has been a long time since I've seen you. How are you?

K. I. A. Cut up—lost Fly-Away. Are you fixed? Want another woman.

S. F. G. Rather. I've been with Jones for four seasons en tour; am playing title role; get big money. But, Mr. K. I. A., I know a good reliable woman for you—Miss Hard-Worker; she's been in opera; has had years of experience in all roles; has a good voice; can act, too, and will suit you down to the ground. Put her address down—10 Poverty Row, S. W., and send for her; I'm sure it will be O. K. (Slaps him on shoulder) Good-bye. Good morning, Mr. K. I. A. Hope you'll be pleased. (Exits smiling.)

K. I. A. Send for that Miss Hard-Worker; let's hear her sing—size her up—salary no object. Have her here by three o'clock. (Exits.)

* * * * * * * * * *

Same day, 3 p. m. Enters Miss Hard-Worker, quietly dressed.

Miss H. W. I am Miss H. W. I've called about the letter.

S. F. Yes. (Looks at her critically.) First, answer three questions. Are you disengaged for next season? Can you accept the prima role in an opera for a West End theatre, and, how much salary do you want?

H. W. Well, I'm not exactly engaged for next season. I can always return to my Grand Opera Co. I can accept your offer for the West End. What's the part—how much is it worth, and what have you been paying for it?

S. F. (angrily) That's got nothing to do with it. How much do you want?

H. W. I can't answer that. I might want $500 a week—I might be worth it but no one would pay it. I can only tell you what I get now and can bring other contracts to show you. Season before last I drew $75 and 10 per cent of the gross. I "starred" in that opera and put some money into it. This last season I got $120 for three shows a week. You say it is for a West End theatre. That's a great opportunity for a prima who is comparatively unknown. If, by accepting a smaller salary, I could become a permanent member of Smith's Co., I would do so.

S. F. Not at all, my dear woman. The part is a "corker"! They pay $100 for it and only $100. If I act as your agent, you are my client and must not cheapen yourself even for Smith. When will you sing for me?

H. W. Now. (Miss H. W. sits at piano and sings three songs one after another.)

S. F. (joyously, and with a vision of $10 commission per week My dear Miss H. W.! I had no idea there was such a voice in all London. Magnificent! Glorious! (Pours forth gush ad lib. H. W., who has heard all this a thousand times before, simply smiles. S. F. then arranges for her to sing for K. I. A. at the Frivolity theatre next day.)

* * * * * * * * * * *

Next day, 12 m. Frivolity Stage. (Miss H. W. singing to a murdered accompaniment played by London's "greatest composer" who smells to high Heaven of brandy and sodas; K. I. A. listens.)

Great Composer. Good voice—yes, good voice. Can you sing high C?

H. W. Yes—and higher. I am doing Leonore, Lucia, Santuzza, Nedda and Marguerite en tour with the Pine-Apples. (Sings Romeo and Juliette waltz with the usual sky rockets.)

K. I. A. (after song) Yes—thank you. Mr. S. F. will write you tomorrow. Good-day.

H. W. Good-day, Mr. K. I. A. ,and thank you, Mr. G. C., for your splendid accompaniment. It was so sympathetic! (Shakes hands with each and exits. Reaching home—10 Poverty Row—tells Hubby in a greatly excited way of her good luck; embellishes every little point with a rosy hue and both begin to build castles in the air on the strength of position as Prima in Smith's Co. playing in London at the West End.)

* * * * * * * * * * *

Same day, 2. p. m. Luncheon at Savage Club.

L. G. C. and K. I. A. (lingering over black coffee and cigarettes).

L. G. C. Say, K. I. A., that Miss Hard-Worker didn't have a bad voice but I think it's a bit heavy for you. It's all right for Grand Opera but we don't want versatility; find your line and play it. Now, I have in mind a soubrette kind of girl—no voice to speak of but great style—great dresser, too, on the street; makes a good show—in fleshings—and all her own, too, and I know she can be gotten CHEAP—for $40 at the most. You might hear Miss Inconstancy sing. Let's run up to her flat She's got the score there, too, of my new opera. Of course, she's independent, you know. She's a friend of Lewis' on the Exchange; he gives her spending money. She'd dress the part out of sight, too. She's going to get Lewis to back my new opera. You give her the part and I'll give you the first option on it. That's fair. It won't cost you anything, and Lewis'll find all the money. It's just as well to have a woman who can put a few thousands into the show to pull it up, in case it topples a bit. What d'ye say?

K. I. A. (looking at watch.) Don't mind. I've got until 7 p. m. Am dining with Birdie at her flat. The Missus is still away with the kids on their vacation. Send your note.

L. G. C. (writing).

My dearest Claire:

Tog out in your best. I'm coming up with K. I. A. who wants a Prima. Send Lewis a wire you'll not be at home.

Lots of love, Sweetest.

Maid. Yes, sir. This way, please. (Ushers G. C. and K. I. A. into gorgeously furnished drawing-room and exits.)

(Enters Miss I., dressed in Worth costume, wearing $5,000 of jewels on fingers, wrists, neck and ears.)

Miss I. Aw—my deah Mr. G. C.! how chawmed! (G. C. introduces K. I. A. Miss I. shakes one of his fingers.) Delighted, you know! My friend has so often spoken of you—don't cher know.

(Two hours filled with small talk, several large cold bottles, biscuits, cigarettes and two light comic songs sung by Miss I in a squeaking, babyish voice.)

6 p. m. L. G. C. and K. I. A. (rising to take their leave).

K. I. A. Well, Miss I., you will call then on me at the Frivolity tomorrow. I shall be expecting you. Good-day (shakes hands; exit).

Next morning, noon. K. I. A. sitting in private office, Frivolity Theatre. "No Admittance" printed in large letters on glass door. Knock on door heard.

K. I. A. Come in (rises as door opens to admit Miss I.). Ah, my dear Miss I, Punctuality itself! How are you? Sit down (arranges easy chair). Let me have your parasol. Put your feet on this(arranges stool for her). Well, (sits in chair drawn up directly in front of her), have you decided about the part? I really can't offer you more than $40 but you'll have the advantages of a splendid role. Miss Fly-Away had $50; of course she has such a big name one must pay for that. She's not near so sweet as you (drawing closer to her. Miss I. tries to blush). In the third act you'll have to wear a boy's suit, but you won't mind that, I'm sure; for your figure (lays a hand upon her knee) I'm certai nis perfect!"

Miss I. Oh, I've worn tights, I don't mind.

K. I. A. Say, how good are you going to be to me for giving you this part?

Miss I. (innocently) Good? Oh, I'm always good to everybody.

K. I. A. But hang it all, Claire. You see how easily your name slipped out—sweet name, sweeter owner. I don't want you to be good to everybody. The part is a great one for you; it means success and a great name. I'll fix up your dressing room for you in great style and I'll see that your gowns are the talk of the town. I'll have you paragraphed and advertised all over this country in all the papers and magazines. Come now (stroking her arms), that's fair. You be good and kind to me and I'll be good and kind to you. Is it a go?

Miss I. I do want the part. Yes, I'll sign for $40. I'll leave everything in your hands.

K. I. A. Good. There's a bargain! (Leans over and kisses her.)

Miss I. (disentangling herself) You naughty boy!

K. I. A. Oh, no, I'm not! I'm good—good to you (kisses her again). Say, I'm beastly hungry. Let's celebrate our compact by lunching together. (Goes to telephone, rings.) Are you there? Give me Great Hotel, 3146 Gerrard (turns round while waiting for answering ring). It's such a lovely quiet place—so reserved—good attention and—(speaking in phone) yes; is this Great Hotel? I'm K. I. A. Is the New York suite engaged for luncheon? No? All right; have luncheon served at two o'clock for two. Same wines as usual—cold—and have Tom serve. Good-bye (hangs up 'phone). Now then, Claire, we'll have a nice quiet luncheon. I have some little business to attend to first. You call a hansom, go on ahead to the Hotel, third flight up, at the end of the long hall, last room on the right is New York suite. Wait for me there. I won't be late. Au revoir (hands her parasol to her, opens door and Miss I exits smilingly).

K. I. A. (closing door.) Wouldn't do to let the boys see me with her. They'd tell Birdie. Not bad figure—I'll see how she puts up. (Whistles latest comic song, "Little Bit Off the Top"; presses button, Page enters.) Jim, I'm off to the races on the two o'clock; won't be back until the show tonight. Call a hansom.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Same day, 6 p. m. Miss I. exits, alone, from Great Hotel, calls hansom and drives homeward.

6:20 p. m. K. I. A. exits, alone, from same hotel, calls hansom, rides to Club where he dresses for "front of the house" at the Frivolity Theatre.

Next day, breakfast hour at Poverty Row.

Hubby (reading "Green-Room Gossip" column in Daily Sale). Well, well, dearie. The part has gone. (Reads.) "Miss I. has been engaged by K. I. A. to play the title role in 'Sallie Brown' formerly played by Miss Fly-Away." Well, well! Miss I.; who is she? I've never even heard of her.

H. W. Why, she's the chorus girl at the Belvedere; you know, the one that stood on the right end with that dyed yellow hair and who wore such a gorgeous gown covered with diamonds. Don't you remember?

Hubby. A chorus girl!

H. W. Yes, a chorister!

Hubby. And she's to play the leading role?

H. W. Yes! (sadly).

Hubby. By God! (with strong emphasis) it's wonderful how it's done!

H. W. (with dimmed eyes, as she drops an extra lump of sugar into his cup), It is wonderful how it's done!

INSTANTANEOUS WATER HEATER.

Henry Hoffmann of 458 Guererro street says of the Ribbon Water Heater: "It does all you claim for it, and even more than I expected when I selected it from amongst a half-dozen patents of heaters used by friends. It is simple, practical and free from danger. An important point, in my estimation, is that the water can be regulated with the greatest facility. When by order of the doctor I need a bath at 112 degrees, it is 112 to the fraction of a degree." See advertisement on page 30.

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought or other fads. Instruction private, not classes. We solicit investigation.

STAGE

A Second Edition

What "Way Down East" would be without its snowstorm is hard to say. That snowstorm is good enough to carry it through several more seasons. When the play last visited us, one of the Sunday Supps described how the storm was made, measuring every grain of salt in its composition, but still the storm mystifies us as if we did not know how it is done. Joe Grismer did a great deed when he invented that storm. The play will probably draw good houses during its run for there are always plenty of people who enjoy these rural dramas with their simple scenes of every-day life. The company this year is neither better nor worse than the one we saw last season. If anything, Grace Hopkins is rather an improvement on Beryl Hope. I should like to see Phoebe Davies in her original role of Anna, but that pleasure seems to be always denied. John Brennan as Hi the chore-boy is amusing. His scene with Anna, by the fire when they have their homely little feast, is one of the best things in the play.

She Has Been Here Before

Pilar Morin, leading lady of "The French Maid," is not a stranger to San Francisco. She came here a few years ago and appeared at the Baldwin in pantomime with Edwin Belknap and a New York company. Orchestral concerts with her husband, Aimee Lachaume, the pianist, as director were given in connection with the pantomime. The venture was not a success for our people were not educated up to entertainment that required the full strength of the intellect to comprehend. Pilar-Morin went to New York and later returned to Paris where she introduced the coon song with pickaninny accompaniment. She is a pretty woman, intensely Parisian in manner .When she was here she lived at the Savoy.

Left Society for the Stage

Lillian Coleman who is with "The French Maid" is a San Francisco girl who has made several several Eastern successes. Her sister Alice lately followed Lillian's example and went on the stage. Both the sisters chose their profession with the consent of their mother, who is a woman of broad mind and up-to-date ideas. She is wealthy and gave her daughters every advantage in the way of education and accomplishment. When Alice decided to become a singer like her sister, Mrs. Coleman gave up her beautiful home in Pacific avenue, and went to New York with her daughter.

Journalism in the Drama

Howard Scott at the Alcazar and Edwin Emery at the Central are this week portraying types of newspaper men. Scott is a "reporter" and Emery a "war correspondent." Of the two the latter is more nearly like the real thing. Scott cannot help the position in which he is placed. For years and years I can remember no stage "reporter" who did not come to the fray armed with a huge stenographer's note book, which he constantly flourished before the faces of his victims. The reporter is by no means the whole of "The Orient Express" but he is the most intensely prominent figure in it. The war correspondent in "The African King" is one of the heroes of the melodrama.

"A Little Tragedy at Tien Tsin," which Grace George is shortly to produce as a curtain-raiser for "Under Southern Skies," is an adaptation by Frances Aymar Matthews of her story of the same name which appeared in Harper's. The tale was as dramatic and caused almost as much comment as did John Luther Long's "Madame Butterfly."

There is no chance whatever of Jessie Bartlett Davis' return to comic opera. That's what Jessie herself says. She was recently offered a position to star in a scenic revival of "Fatinitza" but she refused it, saying that vaudeville was good enough for her.

Attractions Next Week

"The Serenade," which goes on at the Tivoli next week, should be splendidly sung and acted, for the stock company is strong and capable. Of all the Bostonians' operas, only "Robin Hood" exceeded "The Serenade" in popularity. It is full of charming music and the tuneful "I love thee, I adore thee" theme runs through the entire opera. William Schuster will join the company in this opera, having Cowles' role of Romero. Frances Graham will have Jessie Bartlett Davis' part of Dolores and Anna Lichter will be Yvonne. All the strength of the company is in the cast.

George Ober is as clever a comedian as has been seen here in years and his work in "A Temperance Town" shows him as an original and excellent exponent of Hoyt comedy. For the second week of Mr. Ober's engagement at the Grand will be presented "A Midnight Bell," another of the Hoyt plays, and one of his best. It should draw crowded houses. Special attention has been given to the getting up of the scenery, which on account of the location of the play will be quite a feature. Mr. Ober will be seen in his original role of the Deacon and the full strength of the company will support him.

"Way Down East" will go all next week at the Columbia and on Monday night, March third, we shall see for the first time here Augustus Thomas' play "Arizona." Grace Elliston, who was here with Henry Miller, will be in the cast.

The Hawaiian Glee Club is one of the best musical numbers the Orpheum has ever had. A complete change of repertoire will be presented by the dusky singers and players next week. Josephine Sabel is coming back for a week and the Blossoms, acrobats, will remain for another week. Warren and Blanchard, lyric comedians, will have a lot of new things to offer, including the latest song success, "A Little Boy in Blue." The new people will be the three Meers, direct from Europe, with a comedy wire act which has held the continent laughing for several seasons; Billy Clifford, monologist; the Probyn Ladies' quartet, English and all born musicians; J. C. Nugent and Grace Fertig, in the farce "The Absent Minded Beggar."

W. H. Crane's comedy "The Head of the Family" will have its first presentation in this city at the Alcazar next week. It is a farce partly adapted from the German of L'Arrenge by Clyde Fitch and Leo Ditrichstein and has been presented at the majority of the first-class theatres in the large Eastern cities by high-priced organizations. The Alcazar is one of the first stock houses in America to produce it. It is of a domestic character and is said to be very clever. "Madame Sans Gene" will probably follow. In the near future a new play by Charles Francis Bryant will be produced.

That old favorite "The Corner Grocery" will be given at the Central next week, with Frank Bacon as the groceryman.

Chicago Symphony Orchestra

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which gives its first concert at Metropolitan hall next Wednesday night is the largest musical organization that has visited this city for many years, the Grau opera company excepted. The organization numbers over fifty men directed by Adolph Rosenbecker and is accompanied on this tour by four eminent soloists. The programs have rarely been equaled anywhere for quality, variety, and novelty. As these are the first symphony concerts given evenings for a number of years, they should attract a large number of people who cannot attend the afternoon concerts and consequently have been forced to forego the pleasure of hearing this class of music. The program for Wednesday night will be: Overture, Tannhauser, Wagner; concerto for violin, Wieniawski, Mr. Jan Van Oordt; Symphony No. 3 Scotch, Mendelssohn; waltz, On the Beautiful Blue Danube, Strauss; aria for tenor, from Giaconda, Ponchielli, Mr. E. C. Towne; suite, Carmen, Bizet; aria for soprano, Queen of Sheba, Gounod, Madame Ragna Linne; overture "1812," Tschaikowsky. The program for Friday night will be: Overture Magic Flute, Mozart; concerto for violoncello (A minor), Saint Saens, Mr. Franz Wagner; Symphony, E Minor (Pathetique), Tschaikowsky; Suite "Peer Gynt," Grieg; aria, "Lend Me Your Aid," Gounod, Mr. Towne; waltz, Roses From the South," Strauss; aria from "Herodiade," Massenet, Madame Linne; overture, Robespierre, Litolf. Saturday afternoon will be devoted entirely to Beethoven and Wagner, the former being represented by his Leonore overture No. 3, seventh symphony and violin concerto and the latter by vocal numbers from "Meistersinger" and "Tannhauser" and the vorspiel to "Lohengrin," "Huldigung's March," and Waldweben from "Siegfried." Saturday night will be "soloists' night," all four of the artists being on the program. Van Ordt will play the Parsifal paraphrase by Wilhelmj, Volkman's cello concerto will be played for the first time in this city, and both vocalists will sing, Mr. Towne giving the aria from "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast," another novelty. The Symphony will be Raff's "Lenore." The prices of the seats for these concerts range from seventy-five cents to one dollar and a half and are now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Handel's "Messiah" was given admirable treatment by the Berkeley Oratorio Society, directed by Clinton R. Morse, on Thursday evening of last week, the solo parts being taken with fine effect by Miss Grace I. Davis, soprano; Mrs. Carroll-Nicholson, contralto; Roy Max Smith, tenor; S. Homer Henley, bass. The society contains sixteen sopranos, fourteen contraltos, nine tenors and fourteen bass voices and is well balanced. Mr. Morse has trained the singers very carefully, as was shown in their rendition of the choruses in the oratorio. The Orchestral Society of thirteen members gave excellent support; Miss Maud Wellendorff was at the piano. In April the Oratorio Society will produce Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

THE ORIGINAL VIENNA BAKERY

After-theatre parties find the new location of the Original Vienna, at 133-135 O'Farrell street, much more convenient than when it was at 205 Kearny street. It is now in easy reach of all the uptown theatres and is a very pleasant place to enjoy refreshments after the play. The service is excellent and the menu contains all the delicacies of the season. F. B. Galindo is the manager of the Original Vienna Bakery.

The Puritan Dining Room, 413 Market street, is patronized by all who enjoy good meals, well cooked and of pure foods. The service at the Puritan is especially deserving of commendation.

No brand of whisky is more popular than Argonaut "O. K." It is recommended by physicians and epicures. E. Martin & Co., 54-56 First street, are proprietors of Argonaut "O. K." whiskies, rye and bourbon.

The Boston Singing club, Hiram Greenwood Tucker, conductor, gave its first concert in January, assisted by Miss Edith E. Torrey, soprano, and Mr. George Turner Phelps, pianist. The program consisted of unaccompanied choral works, mediaeval and modern, among which I was pleased to note two by Dr. H. J. Stewart, "Out in the Open Meadow" and "The Singers," the latter written especially for the club, and arranged for eight voices. The words are those of Longfellow:

"God sent his singers upon earth
With songs of gladness and of mirth,
That they might touch the hearts of men,
And bring them back to heaven again."

Idalene Cotton, Nick Long and Fred Titus are all in the cast of Dan Daly's musical comedy, "The New Yorkers."

MUSIC

The Symphony Concert

Though the audience at the symphony concert last Friday was somewhat larger than on previous occasions, it by no means reached the proportions that its worth deserved. I cannot explain the apathy of the majority of our people who call themselves musical with regard to these concerts. It is only through practice that the performances will become perfect, and if the concerts are not supported there will be no opportunity for practice. It would be easy of course to pick flaws in last Friday's program, but it would be impossible to ask for a more finished, poetic and beautiful rendering of the unfinished symphony of Schubert. No orchestra has ever played it here with such thorough understanding of its parts. That the audience appreciated Steindorff's reading of it was testified in the warm applause that followed each part. "The Life of the Czar" which opened the program was a nondescript work of composition, more noise than melody, interesting solely for the type of composition it represents. The "Huldegung" march was played with the vigor it demands and the "Suite" by Bizet was brilliantly given. The symphonic poem "Phaeton" by Saint-Saens was not the least enjoyable of the numbers. The next concert has been postponed until March seventh and a very interesting program is being arranged for it.

Vera Michelena

Beatrice Michelena

Josef Hofmann's Good-bye

The second series of Hofmann concerts was it anything more successful than the first and San Francisco's musical element is in a state of unequivocal enthusiasm over the work of the young artist who looks such a boy and plays with such mature and finished interpretation. In speaking of Hofmann's work it is difficult to know just what to say first, just which part of his wonderful performance takes precedence of the rest. It is as a whole like a highly polished and perfectly flawless gem that as a thing entire gives delight from every point of view. Personally, Josef Hofmann is something of a wonder considering his career. Perfectly simple and unassuming, of the most abstemious habits and detesting anything like show or display, he is probably the most developed intellectually and possesses the finest education of any artist before the public today. A boy almost in years, his time has been conserved to count for improvement along all lines since he was a mere child with a mind that demanded the cause for every effect seen in things that attracted him. His personality is charming probably because of his utter simplicity and lack of affectation. For the artist as the public sees him, his work is something to wonder at. There is a subtlety in his handling of familiar works that gives one a new and beautiful insight. The force is there when required, as the "Tannhauser" overture, the "Erl Koenig," "March in the Ruins of Athens" and other numbers demonstrated full well; but in the main he subdues his powerful capabilities to produce the finesse of delicate and poetic interpretation in whatever he has in hand. I never heard Chopin's lovely "Berceuse" so dreamily, delicately interpreted. I never heard the lark sing with such brilliant and exhilarating joyousness in the "Morgenstandchen" of Schubert, from beneath the fingers of any other artist. It is these minor compositions that call for the excess of delicate handling to bring out the poetic lines, that tell the tale more than the heavier compositions that can be flung off with abandon and fine display of technique. Hofmann plays Bach wonderfully, he interprets Chopin intelligently and gives to Schubert all the tenderness that lay at the heart of the short-lived composer of heavenly melodies and finds such ready speech in his songs. Mendelssohn under his fingers becomes the interpretation of the composer himself. Beethoven sounds a prayer from his fingers and Rubinstein he plays as one who knows the soul of the writer. Wagner is performed by a whole orchestra beneath his magic touch and many of the excerpts from the master's works that so delighted us were the arrangement of Hofmann himself as was the "Beautiful Blue Danube" with its sparkle and laughter and tears that he gave us twice in encore. One of the most pleasing features of any of his concerts was the assistance at a second piano of the artist's father, Casimer Hofmann, who without previous rehearsal gave in splendid style with his son the Chopin concerto which both say they never played together before this concert. To a rousing encore Hofmann senior could not be persuaded to respond, yet he is an artist on his own account, and as a child, an infant prodigy, traveled with Rappoldi the violinist, then a boy also, in concert. Rappoldi is now a celebrated violinist and located in Dresden.

"How do you do it?" Hofmann was asked after executing some delightful bits that sang, like individual voices, now separately then together. "Why, this way," he replied, demonstrating. "You see," he continued, "had I studied with —— or —— I should have struck the keys and produced an entirely different effect. As it is I studied with Rubinstein and from him learned to make the tones sing"—a simple explanation enough, too, but it takes the soul of an artist born to think the singing tone before the little trick of technique is used to interpret it and make it audible to others—and this is Hofmann. His farewell concert Sunday night was an ovation and the modest young artist, usually so loth to respond to encores, was on this occasion quite lavish and appeared in three numbers not on the program, the wonderful fire theme from "Die Walkure," which is his own realistic arrangement, and the "Blue Danube" among other things.

Among the many functions given in honor of the young artist during his stay here was an elaborate dinner at the Bohemian club on the evening of February thirteenth, when the guests were Josef and Casimer Hofmann, Mayor Eugene E. Schmitz, Park Commissioner Altman, Frank P. Deering, Horace G. Platt, Vanderlynn Stow, Judge M. C. Sloss, Sir Henry Heyman, Louis Sloss Jr., I. G. Waterman and Charles J. Dickman.

Nordica's First Recital

One would be hard to please who would not be gratified with the reception accorded Nordica at her first concert in Metropolitan hall on Monday night. It was a representative audience that greeted the singer. Nordica's appearance on a concert program was received with varying emotions by those in the audience. We have idealized this gifted woman to such an extent it was with a feeling of almost sacrilege that we heard her sing the songs that are done by others who can do nothing else. Nordica has become so identified with Wagner's heroic characters that it seemed like a long, long step downward to reach the common every-day concert platform, and it was the songs that brought out the heroic character of her magnificent voice that she pleased most in. Allitsen's "Song of Thanksgiving" with the sentiment "Thank God for love!" was of the heroic class and was finely done. The "Voi che Sapete" is too small and dainty for this Brunhilde of a woman and I must confess I would rather hear it from Fritzi Scheff's Cherubino. But it won a rousing encore and in response she gave Nevin's "Mighty Lak a Rose" with real negro mammy style and intonation. If My Song Had Wings" by Hahn was another fine number which to an insistent encore was in part repeated. After the "Maids of Cadiz" she gave for encore "When Love is Kind" with much of the dramatic effect which it is apparent at every turn she represses with difficulty. Of the other numbers the Strauss "Serenade" was most pleasing and was given so rousing an encore, she sang again, giving "How Lovely is Spring" in splendid style. But it was "Brunhilde's Call" that gave us back the Nordica we love and roused the house to the old pitch of noisy enthusiasm. In nothing is she so beautiful, so heroic, so entirely above the large majority of opera singers as we have known them as in this character. In works of a dramatic character she shines with a special brilliance. I can imagine her singing Chaminade's "Song of Faith" gloriously. E. Romayne Simmons acompanied Nordica's songs with fine intelligence and rendered the Polonaise C sharp minor of Chopin. He was well received and modestly refused to respond to a really hearty encore. A second concert was given on Wednesday night and there will be a matinee today at which Von Fielitz's song cycle "Eliland" will be given and other interesting numbers.

The dramatic class of the Von Meverinck School of Music covered itself with glory last Thursday evening a week ago when that department gave an entertainment to display the progress the school is making in that direction. In the "Song of the Norns" cantata, Maude Fay and Helen Heath carried the solos and won many laurels for their training, and in the "Der Freischutz" excerpts Miss Heath and Mae Cullen did work that would have been creditable in professionals, Maybelle Craig doing the bridesmaid in the same act. Owing to the disappointment caused by Mr. Tronchet's inability to appear at the last moment, the fencing had to be given up and Mrs. Decker-Cox made a very agreeable substitute for this number in two beautifully rendered songs, "Ich Liebe Dich," Grieg, and "Love is Forever," Brahms. Besides this a fancy dance was given by Miss Alkman, a pupil of Senora Matildita's class, to show among others one of the features attendant on the dramatic training of the school. It was a most enjoyable evening, some of the best features of which will be repeated the evening of March seventeenth.

Thursday evening at the Von Meyerinck School the junior class of Arthur Fickenscher's piano pupils gave a recital in the recital hall of the school assisted by the school quartet (vocal). This and the Zech string quartet concert occurring the same afternoon will be reviewed next week.

At the last concert given by the San Rafael Orchestral Society, Miss Mary Carrington was the piano soloist and won great commendation for her superior work. The papers spoke of her work in glowing terms. Miss Carrington is rapidly coming to the front as a pianiste. At the closing lecture given by Emlyn Lewys she rendered a Chopin etude as well as other numbers in a style that won her many recalls. The series has been such a success that requests have been made for a continuance of the same which may be considered by Mr. Lewys. At the last lecture Mr. Lewys himself took the piano and illustrated his subject with a movement from a Beethoven sonata.

Miss Siegel's Pupils

A large audience enjoyed the recital last Friday evening by the vocal pupils of Fraulein Lotte Seigel. The program rendered was of a high order and there was only one disappointment—the non-appearance of Mr. Lucius Solomons, who was to have rendered the prize song from "Die Meistersinger" but a cold prevented. Miss Wilson, one of the participants, is to appear in Mascagni's opera "L'Amico Fritz" next month. All of the singers acquitted themselves in a manner that showed their good training. The program in full was: Allerseelen, Lassen, Frühlingslied, Gounod, Miss Lewkovitz; Since First I met Thee, Rubinstein, Love is a Bubble, F. Allitsen, Das Fruhroth leuctet, F. Behr, Miss Emilie Plagemann; For this, De Koven, Through Sunny Spain, Tito Mattei, Mrs. Geo. D. Graham; Prologue from Pagliacci, Leoncavallo, Wanderlust, Robert Schumann, Mr Oskar Frank; Aria and Ricitativ from Figaro, Mozart, Ich liebe dich, Grieg, Miss Olga Wagner; Sunset, Dudley Buck, Le parlate d'amor from Faust, Gounod, Miss Lillian Wilson; Elsa's Dream from Lohengrin, Wagner, Mrs. Lucius Solomons.

Last evening the second concert by Belle Clair Chamberlain was given and will be reviewed in next week's issue. Miss Chamberlain is a pianiste of undisputed talents and her work places her high in professional ranks. Her name was well known in Oakland where as a child she was regarded as an infant prodigy and attracted the attention of Lottie Alexander, then just graduated from Stuttgart, who became her first teacher and under whose valuable tuition she remained many years. Fred Zech Jr., and later Zeisler and Carreno completed the work that has turned out one of our foremost pianists and one of whom Carreno has said that "if she would, she might with her talents become world renowned."

Two Talented Sisters

The two daughters of Fernando Michelena the well known tenor and erstwhile opera singer of more than ordinary fame have lately been accorded a degree of honor for their musical attainments incompatible, almost, with their youth. For the past two years these young singers, Beatrice and Vera, aged but eighteen and sixteen years, have been studying assidously with their father under his incomparable method, with grand opera as the goal of their ambitions. Both have developed voices of unusual power, flexibility and sweetness, that of Vera being really a wonderful dramatic soprano and that of Beatrice more of the lyric style. It chanced during "The Princess Chic" engagement here that John Palmer Slocum, who is manager of Frank Daniels' opera company, "Beside the Bonny Briar Bush," "Arizona" and the New Colonial theatre New York, through the change that placed Maude Berri in the lead, came to this city and while here heard these two voices. He was entranced with voice and method, personality and the eminent fitness of things in general for operatic work, for both girls are uncommonly and strikingly handsome as well as possessing fine minds of their own, and he immediately on his own account offered them a five years' contract to star in comic opera. This was so entirely unthought-of, the aim being for grand opera and years of study yet anticipated toward this end, that it was impossible on the spot to give a reply. Slocum keeps his offer open and the Michelenas, loth to break up the home here, are in a quandary as to what they ought to do in the matter. Signor Michelena would in the first event return to his old operatic work and on the other hand they have been so united here and he so successful in his teaching it makes decision very difficult. However a few months will tell the tale and Manager Slocum is full of rosy predictions for the future of these two talented girls whom we may not be able to keep among us much longer if Mr. Slocum has his way.

What European Critics Call Alma Stencel

It is possible that San Francisco may contribute to the musical world a star as great as Josef Hofmann, judging by the opinions of Berlin critics. Alma Stencel did not have to go abroad to secure recognition, but it is pleasing to the San Francisco critics to have their word confirmed by that of their brethren abroad. In commenting upon a performance of Alma Stencel in Berlin the German Times, of that city, says that little Alma's absolute memory and her modulation of tone are "two gifts that come from Above and cannot be acquired by the most assiduous practice or the greatest talent for imitation. To play in one evening Sauer's concerto in E minor, five difficult solos, and then Liszt's concerto in E flat, is a feat of memory never before equaled by any other child-pianist." The Times pays particular tribute to "her teacher, Mr. Hugo Mansfeldt of San Francisco, who understood how to guide this tender musical plant into the path along which is can develop surely and normally." Alma played in Buda-Pesth with Kubelik, and the Philharmonic Orchestra; in vienna before the Austrian Imperial family. She received gifts of jewels from the Emperor and the Archbishop gave her a jeweled gold box that he had carried for years. Rosenthal, who was a fellow-student under Liszt with Alma's teacher, Mr. Mansfeldt, wrote to Moszkowski, "The greatest child pianist I have heard."

A Week of Music

Something new in the way of celebrating the opening of new piano warerooms is the musical festival given by the Wiley B. Allen Co. this week. Beginning on Monday evening a promenade recital has been given every night. On Monday Miss Neamata Vermont Van Pelt's piano pupils gave a recital that was largely attended. On Tuesday evening the program was furnished by the advanced pupils of E. S. Bonelli's Conservatory of Music. Wednesday evening, pupils of Mrs. S. Ursomando and Miss Jenny Shalley took part. Wallace Sabin, organist of St. Luke's and Emanu-El directed Thursday's program. Miss Elizabeth Westgate and A. T. Stewart with their pupils provided last evening's program, and tonight George R. Hughes will direct the recital.

The concert to be given in this city early next month by Emma Nevada will no doubt be productive of a large amount of pleasure. The company coming with Nevada is one of the most expensive that has ever been brought to this country. In addition to the little diva herself, the company will include the court violoncellist of the Queen of Spain, Pablo Casals. The latter was a protege of the Spanish Queen, who bore all the expenses of his education and presented him with the magnificent instrument upon which he plays. Moreau, the pianist of the party, is one of the newer school of French composers and is considered the greatest technician among the pianists of France. Maquarre has been the flute soloist of the Lamoureaux and Colonne orchestras in Paris for the past two years and was the winner of the gold medal at the Conservatoire. Heath Gregory, the only vocalist of the party besides the prima donna, is an American singer. The program offered is one of length and diversity. —The Music Critic

Discovery of a Red Clay in Colorado and its remarkable Effect upon the Hair

This Clay is nothing more nor less than mud and water, which comes from a mine in Colorado. The Clay is perfectly harmless, will not stain the most delicate skin. Applied to the hair it changes it to beautiful shades, such as no hair dye has ever succeeded in producing. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the Clay bath—light shades from one-half hour to two hours—medium shades from two to six hours—dark from six to twelve hours. Gray hair can be changed to original color without changing the natural color, or the following tints with darker or lighter shades as desired: Black, brown, auburn and Titian red. Peroxide hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. Unlike dyes, the Clay stain is permanent, never wears off; can only be bleached off. The luxury of the shampoo can be indulged in at will as it does not effect the stain in any particular. The Clay never fails to leave the hair soft and glossy, and the one great point we claim for the Clay stain is its perfectly natural appearance. It defies detection. FRANCES C. SHERMAN

History of California's Poppy

"The Golden Poppy," by Professor Emory Smith of Stanford University, is a beautiful volume, from whatever point it is considered. It is the pioneer in its field, being the first book published on a State or National Emblem, and it has set a standard which will be difficult for another to reach and all but impossible to pass. It is fitting that this should be the first book on the subject, since though without legislative sanction as yet, California was the first State to have adopted an emblem, New York having made a selection of the golden-rod previously to the adoption of our eschscholtzia, but changing subsequently to the rose. Professor Smith has done his utmost to compile an exhaustive treatise. He has collected the history, bibliography, lore and legends which pertain to the flower, together with historical incidents, and has made an exhaustive collection of the references to it in literature. Luther Burbank, the world-famous propagator, contributes a chapter on culture, and Carl Ackermann gives practical advice to those who would photograph the flower. Augusta Wey, Eliza D. Keith, Charles Keeler and other well-known writers contribute chapters, and Johannes Reimers tells of his first flower, raised from seed brought to Norway by a sailor, planted with utmost care, and brought to blossom in spite of the prediction of the professor of botany that the eschscholtzia would never bloom in Norway. Not content with all this, Professor Smith has also collected all the poems and songs and children's verses, so that there would seem to be no other word to be added. The illustrations are exquisite, and are as exhaustive as the text. The frontispiece is a colored reproduction of a water color by Paul de Longpre, and the allegorical initials, designed by Alice Chittenden, show the development of the poppy from leaf to seed pod. In addition to the numerous photographs and drawings of different species, including Chamisso's original sketch (1820), and views of whole fields of both the wild and cultivated blossom, there are headings, tail pieces, and conventionalized designs, and added to all this, examples of the eschscholtzia in decorative work, wall papers, pyrography, silver and goldsmiths' work, and pottery, and a suggestion of its value in architecture. The book is fittingly bound in green with the poppy in gold as cover design. No question of finance has tarnished "The Golden Poppy's" pages. From cover to cover it is a heart's homage to the "Flower of Gold." In a special chapter, Professor Smith has mentioned by name not only those of his collaborators who have assisted with text and illustrations, but those handicraftsmen who rarely receive their meed of praise for their part in the composition and presswork, the engraving, binding, and other points which make or mar a book, and this is one which it is a joy to own.

Travels in Mexico

The reader who will take "A Glimpse of Old Mexico" at the author's own valuation, and not expect rhetorical flourishes and literary graces will find abundance of entertainment, instruction and information. Mr. Wilkins made a short business trip into the interior of our sister republic in the spring of last year, and the series of letters which make up the all too brief volume was written for the San Rafael weekly of which he is the editor, and without any design of book publication. The employes of the office gathered them into pamphlet form for gratuitous distribution amongst friends, and inquiry for copies has led to the printing of this second edition, illustrated by photographs taken by the author. "My first intention," he says, "was to change the form entirely, but a little work soon satisfied me that it is as difficult to remodel an old story as to reconstruct an old house," so the letters, except for a little occasional expansion, and the correction of errors, remain substantially as first written. Mr. Wilkins is a good observer, and has a breezy, colloquial style which is not to be confounded with flippancy and slanginess. On the contrary, he maintains a certain amount of dignity even in his most relaxed moments. Mr. Wilkins' business was in connection with mining, and naturally there is more of that subject than of any other industry, and he tells some stories of lost mines which are enough to turn all the would-be millionaires in the direction of Mexico instead of Alaska: "For these are not stories like those current on the mother lode of California with which we are too familiar, based on the creative memory of some antique mossback, who remembers to have heard Long Pete tell about a cement streak yaller

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff,
vs.
William Henry Weston, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

ALBERT MAHONY, Clerk.
By THOS. F. O'NEIL, Deputy Clerk.

with gold that Broncho Bill and Rooshan Kate found somewhar near Hog Mountain one day when they rid off from camp on a drunk. The trouble with the Mexican stories is that they are absolutely true. They are founded on official records of unquestioned accuracy and other authenticated documents, and they will conduct you ever so close to the boundless wealth, but stop short just when it comes within your grasp." There are some amusing accounts of the stupidity of American and foreign mining companies in connection with the working of their claims, which have done their share towards giving the country a bad name. Though primarily concerned with mining and its interests, Mr. Wilkins kept his eyes on agricultural and other possibilities, and he gives some valuable hints to capitalists looking for a field for investment, though he frankly says Mexico is not a poor man's country, and there is no inducement for people who are not provided with "the stuff." He contradicts the generally accepted belief that the mass of the people ar ignorant, considering their opportunities, or idle, dishonest, untruthful and intemperate to a greater extent than people of similar rank in other parts of the world. In fact, it is quite a new Mexico that we are introduced to, one built up of experience and observation, instead of guide book and foregone conclusions. The final chapter, Home Again, contains some hard, common sense advice on the subject of our commercial relations with our southern neighbor. It is something to be read, marked, learned and inwardly digested by our merchants and manufacturers, and through them it ought to reach the educational luminaries. There are only one hundred and fifteen pages to this little volume, but there is something worth while on nearly every one of them. When Mr. Wilkins goes anywhere again it is to be hoped that he will put his impressions into print. There are many pretentious volumes of travel and description which contain neither the charm nor the information which characterize this unpremeditated excursion into bookland.

Lagerlof and Rosegger

McClure, Phillips & Co. announce that they will have the publication of a new novel by Selma Lagerlof. It is but a few years since the American public was made acquainted with this writer, through the medium of the sympathetic translations of Pauline Bancroft Flach, but each successive volume has its audience awaiting it. It is a sad pity that when so many of the poorest and cheapest of French and German novels are Anglicized each year, we are left in ignorance of the literature of the smaller countries. So far as any concrete evidence is concerned, we might be left to imagine that their inhabitants are dependent on translations from our own language to supply them with reading matter, and yet the tales from the Swedish of Miss Lagerlof are a distinct gain to ourselves. Another translator, who deserves more than a passing word of gratitude is Frances Skinner, who has been the means of introducing to us the novels of the Styrian, Peter Rosegger. Up to the present, but two of these have been done into English, "The Forest Schoolmaster" and "The God Seeker." They are not the kind of books which head the lists of the best selling, but they command the attention of a class of readers who are governed in their selection by something more than the craze of the moment, and they will outlive more than one reading. The title of Miss Lagerlof's forthcoming book is "Jerusalem."

The comments on Wallace Irwin's "Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum" are amusing. Reviewers are not quite certain whether to take them seriously or not. "No one but a district messenger boy or a Browning student can hope to understand every line." "The sonnet has been likened to an exquisite goblet filled with one exquisite thought so that it cannot hold another drop without overflow. Mr. Irwin's sonnets are, we presume, more like schooners of steam beer, and we must not complain if a few bubbles burst over the edge." "We cannot say that the thing is a pardonable impertinence; but we should be inclined to let the author off with a light sentence if he would promise not to do it again." are a few samples. It almost seems as though they were half afraid to encounter the "hoodlum" in the flesh.

PROVIDING THE PIANO SCALE.

Mr. Music: There is a worm in Hawaii that eats hardwood and destroys all the pianos.

Mr. Abusico: We have a piano—where can I get one of those worms?

CHARITY AS A BUSINESS.

The Infant: Say, pap, give me a nickel for my fresh-air fund.

The Governor (suspiciously): Fresh-air fund? Since when have you gone in for charity in fresh air?

The Infant: Since you gave me a bicycle; a nickel's what they charge to blow up the tires with fresh air.

WHY IT'S FEMININE.

Young Student: Pa, is money ever feminine gender?

Professor: Always; it talks.

Miss Deacon: Was that your husband I saw talking to you on a car last evening?

Mrs. Crabtree: Talking to me? No, it couldn't have been Tom.

The Bishop of London tells a good story on a country curate. He was calling on a great lady of the village and, prompted by his unique idea of humor, introduced his newly married wife with that old quotation, "A poor thing madam, but mine own." Whereupon, the lady, eyeing the curate severely, replied, "Your wife ought to have introduced you as a 'poorer thing, but her owner.'"

He: Let's found a mutual admiration society. I'll admire your beautiful face. Now what'll you admire in me?

She: Your good taste.

HER PREDICAMENT.

Dolly: I wanted to scream when he kissed me.

Mollie: Why didn't you?

Dolly: I couldn't while he held me, and when it was all over what was the use?

OUR OPINION

The Taint of Snobbery

Some people are inclined to seek occasion for grumbling, and to take a severely pessimistic view of things. Whatever arouses the interest and enthusiasm of others fills them with indignation and impels them to caustic comment. The visit of Prince Henry, and the much ado made by the press and State officials over that distinguished scion of royalty, have provoked their choicest sneers, and our prospective participation in the Coronation ceremonies threatens to superinduce an attack of apoplexy. They are intolerant of royalty and discern occasion for serious alarm in the present attitude of the nation toward the monarchies of Europe. Some of them are editors of daily newspapers and no doubt if they were permitted to have their way Congress would have been directed to shy a brick at Emperor William's brother as soon as he set foot on American soil. Why anybody should feel that there is danger of contamination from royal blood in this country it is difficult to understand. Perhaps if we were on more familiar terms with the Kings, Princes and Dukes of effete England and lusty Germany the taint of snobbery which has become so offensive in this country would in time be effaced. American snobbery is due largely to a misconception of the relation between the nobility and the common herd of Europe. The gulf between the nobility and the ordinary mortal across the pond is not half so wide as that which separates Newport from the merely respectable citizen of the outer darkness. The visit of a German Prince to this country is not fraught with as much danger to the national character as the customary indifference with which we accept the abuse and injustice of our plutocratic masters. For example: There was the matter of the contempt for the rights of American citizens exhibited some weeks ago by one of the Vanderbilts when he detached an engine from a train loaded with passengers so that he could keep a social engagement in New York. The railroad company which is controlled by the Vanderbilts imposes an extra charge on people that ride on that particular train in consideration of its guarantee to reach New York on schedule time, but the plutocrat with the social date cared not for the good faith of that corporation or the rights of the passengers. He wanted to get into his claw-hammer on schedule time so he sidetracked the train, steamed into New York and left the passengers out in the snow for several hours. Seldom has one of our ridiculously rich testified more eloquently to his sense of the interiority of his humble fellow-citizen, and to his utter disregard of the latter's rights. The incident was mentioned in the newspapers as though young Vanderbilt had done something heroic. If one of the nobility of England or Germany had been guilty of such an act of selfishness the probability is that he would have been mobbed, but the newspapers of this country made no comment on the forbearance of the marooned passengers on the New York Central train. Their failure to derail the engine in their indignation was not suggested even by those papers that are accused from time to time of setting class against class. The fact is that the papers were devoting nearly all their space at that time to absurd items about Teddy Roosevelt's strenuous son who happened to be suffering from a cold. They were publishing pictures of his foot-ball trousers and of the window of the room in which he was being nursed. If he were the heir apparent to the American throne they would not have consumed more space in their accounts of the lad's illness and convalescence. And yet some of us are worrying about Prince Henry's visit and the Coronation. Let us concern ourselves about the national tendency toward snobocracy, and hesitate not to extend the glad hand to foreign potentates.

A Dispute over Culture

Musical authorities in New York and Chicago are now engaged in a dispute as to which city enjoys the higher musical culture. A dispute over such a question is in the nature of a conceit, for there is an apparent absence of musical culture in both cities. When musical culture has attained a high standard in a community the fact cannot be long concealed. A cultured public demands good music and lots of it. Those cities of Europe that boast musical culture of a high order enjoy what is technically known as the musical atmosphere. Good music is heard in public places, and wherever there is good music the people congregate in large numbers. Moreover, they not only refuse to listen to poor music, but they grow wildly indignant when it is thrust upon the ear. In neither New York nor Chicago are any of the uusual symptoms of musical culture manifest. There are no doubt cultured people in both cities, but they are not sufficiently numerous in either to promote a musical atmosphere. All musical functions, and particularly the opera in New York, are dominated by fashion. The operatic performance of Grau's stars is of slight consequence so far as the artists behind the footlights are concerned. The boxes are the principal objects of interest. In the foyer between acts the men discuss stocks. The performance has failed to enthrall them. They seldom enter until the overture is at an end. There are orchestras in Sherry's and Delmonico's where the wealthy assemble after the theatre, but the musicians are of mediocre ability. If they performed in a San Francisco restaurant the proprietor would have to lock the doors to hold his patrons. Musical culture in New York is not such as bespeaks an artistic temperament. It is of the character that finds expression in the Broadway theatres where the wriggling choruses and the wheezy, high kicking soprani abound. Anna Held, she of the feline voice and eloquent hips, is a favorite prima donna in Broadway, with Virginia Earle a close second. Lillian Russell, the best comic opera prima donna in New York, and De Wolf Hopper, the premier comic opera comedian, are in vaudeville in Broadway and they each sing one song. The high kicking females do the rest. It would be hard to find the place of confinement in which Chicago's musical culture is held in restraint. Chicago art finds expression in the Art Institute in Michigan Boulevard where the decrepit statuary left over from the big fair may be found. Chicago has a lofty contempt for Grau's stars but dotes on the Castle Square opera company, owned by one Colonel Savage, a real estate agent of Boston, who has made a success of opera by applying New England business methods to the management of his troupe. There is little likelihood of the musical salvation of America being worked out in Chicago.

Reckless Rearing of Girls

Before the excitement attendant upon the fate of Nora Fuller has subsided, it should seem appropriate to say a word to mothers in general upon the amount of freedom accorded to young girls. Apparently children are emancipated from guardianship and chaperonage at about the age of ten, and thereafter they appear to be their own mistresses. It is astonishing to see the number of little girls who attend the theatres unaccompanied by any older person, or so far as evidence goes even restricted or counseled with regard to the plays they are permitted to witness. They choose their own books from the libraries, and in these days of the newspaper-reading child, they can be relied upon to put in a bid for anything reported to be spicy. They roam about the streets and the park on their bicycles, disport themselves at the Cliff House and the baths, cross the ferries alone, and in general, appear to consult no one but themselves. The improvements in modern housekeeping science have emancipated them from any share in the work of the house, and tender-hearted school boards will not permit them to be burdened with home study. The result is an amount of leisure and time to be killed, and the methods employed in securing that end do not conduce to modesty of behavior or good morals. The children themselves are not to blame. They do what is permitted them, and they pattern after what they see others do. It is doubtful if one mother in ten knows anything about her daughter's associates. She asks no questions and takes no notice so long as she is not "bothered." If the girls are well dressed and curb their tongues while within her hearing, she takes the rest for granted. Girls who are free to come and go when they will, with no further accounting of their time than that they have been "down town with Ethel," or to the "theatre with Jennie," and who are not required to submit even an occasional accounting for the disposal of their pocket money have ample opportunity for making shady acquaintances and spending their leisure in questionable places. Mothers who discover that their girls have been in the habit of picking up acquaintances on the streets, frequenting saloons, accepting gifts and resorting to subterfuges and prevarications have only themselves to blame. If they are not wilfully blind, they are at least woefully heedless. It does not make the case of the man better that that of the girl is worse but it is an ugly commentary on the up-bringing of any girl of seeming respectability that her home life should have afforded opportunities which would even apparently mitigate the conduct of the man. No doubt it was wicked of the wolf to eat Little Red Riding Hood, but why was Little Red Riding Hood loitering in the path of the wolf? One cannot help noting that in the majority of these tragedies of childhood the victims come from homes where the parents have been separated. Frequently before the children are half grown they have seen two or three changes with consequent upheavals, and has spent intervals in Homes, Asylums, or other institutions. Even when the unfortunate cannot be accused of any thing out of place in their conduct, it is not to be expected that, after being fathered intermittently and on the installment plan, they can know how to conduct themselves under trying circumstances.

Water and Water Rates

The city's legislative body is engaged in its annual task of investigating the affairs of the Spring Valley Water Company preparatory to fixing the rates for another year. It is most unfortunate that our water rates cannot be fixed for all time, for then we would have surcease of grumbling, and our city officials would perform their routine duties without indulging in spectacular tricks to impress the multitude with their honesty. There has been no well-founded public grievance against the water company for years. We get plenty of water of a good quality, and we are not charged an exorbitant rate. The only murmurs of discontent are heard at the City Hall. We have had no indignation meetings of angry rate-payers. The complaints against the company that were so frequently heard years ago are no longer voiced, so now the reformers content themselves with advocating government ownership. Incidentally, they attack the water system itself, a system that has aroused the admiration of engineers all over the world. In the long ago we were told that two dry winters would cause a water famine in this city. Later the prophets were compelled to change their prediction. They declared that three dry winters would prove fatal, but we have just had four, and we were well along in the fifth without any apparent diminution of our water supply. The fact is that the Spring Valley water system is far superior to that of many of the leading Eastern cities, and that the water itself is of a better quality than that supplied to people on the other side of the Rockies. Chicago drinking water, for instance, is so dirty as to be objectionable for bathing purposes, and in some of the cities people are compelled to drink mineral waters owing to the bad taste of the water that is piped into their houses. It is absurd to attack the Spring Valley system, for it is one of the best in the country, and it has established a world-wide reputation for the engineer by whom it was constructed, and who for a quarter of a century has steadily anticipated the growth of the city. To continue to do so the company must be allowed a reasonable income. Of course, it may be argued that we could have a better system if the water were piped from the mountains, but at present the Spring Valley system is the only one in operation, and the people that built it and that operate it are entitled to substantial compensation.

The Saunterer

Story of a Hasty Marriage

The California colony in New York is enjoying the story of a hasty and unexpected marriage which took place there a short time ago. The principals were two well known Californians who are mentioned quite frequently in the society columns of the dailies. When the news of the marriage was wired to this city it caused some surprise in club circles, for the groom had been looked upon as a confirmed bachelor. He belongs to a syndicate of Californians who made a good financial turn a year or so ago, and though he keeps in touch with his former companions in this city to none of them had he ever conveyed a hint of a contemplated matrimonial plunge. The bride is a society girl of independent spirit who has traveled extensively in Europe, and who recently established herself in a flat in gay New York. She was thought to be a bachelor girl with not the slightest inclination to lose her freedom.

A Promise Exacted

But now, so the story goes, she had long received the attentions of the man who is now her husband. So faithful was he in his devotion to her that the tea tabbies affected to be greatly shocked, and in time her aristocratic relatives began to murmur their displeasure. Finally one of them, a young physician who lives in New York, visited the erstwhile San Francisco club-man and charged him with the awful crime of promoting a scandal, and tarnishing the 'scutcheon of a family of the richest blue blood that ever flowed in the South. He demanded that a halt be called, and the upshot of it all was that the clubman promised to cut the bachelor girl's flat off his list.

A Successful Conspiracy

For weeks he kept his promise. Presently there entered into the little romance two more characters, a female relative and a distinguished matron who recently returned from a tour of the old world. In their opinion there should be a marriage. They decided that in justice to the girl nothing short of a marriage should end the affair. At their suggestion the girl wrote her ex-cavalier requesting him to call for a final interview. Being a gallant chap he responded regardless of his promise to the young doctor. Just as the greetings were over the two conspirators burst upon the scene and proceeded to chide the gallant club-man for having broken his promise to the doctor. They declared that it was evident that he could not be trusted, and they suggested that the honorable thing for him to do was to marry the girl. He consented to do so, and he wasn't given any time to change his mind. A minister was sent for, and the ceremony was pulled off on the spot. And now the society editors say that the couple are going to Europe.

Behind the Fence

The one supreme effort toward establishing an exclusive colony in Los Angeles has proved a miserable failure. It was the pet project of the founder of St. James Park. His idea was to build a big iron fence and get behind it. He fenced in a large tract of land which he beautified by artistic landscape gardening and divided up into spacious residence lots with private driveways leading from the public highways. He sold the lots only to persons of good social standing and of unblemished reputation, and upon the written agreement to erect residences in strict conformity with his plans. For a while the scheme worked well. Several palatial residences were erected and the little colony of exclusives flourished. But one day along came a parvenu who had made a quick fortune in oil and married a typewriter. He tempted one of the residents of St. James Park with a big cash offer and the man sold his residence. It is now occupied by the man who made money in oil, and his young wife. They are comfortably ensconced behind that high iron fence.

Failure of a Conspiracy

The Tanzer case which was decided in Santa Rosa last week was deserving of much more space and attention than the dailies allotted to it. That is the case to which I referred at the time of the appointment of Attorney Hutton to the police commissionership by Mayor Schmitz. Mr. Hutton was one of the attorneys for Virginia Hutchings, the spurious daughter of the dead man. I was of the opinion that no reputable attorney should attempt to foist such a claim as that of the bold Mrs. Hutchings on the court, and evidently her lawyers were forced to the same conclusion just before the case came to trial, for they deserted her at the eleventh hour. It was not, I believe, until they learned that the evidence gathered by the genuine heirs had been placed in the hands of detectives, with a view to the commencement of criminal proceedings.

The Credulity of Lawyers

But the Tanzer case should not be permitted to expire with the decision of the court. The Hutchings claim bore all the traces of a bungling conspiracy. True, it was espoused by several attorneys who thought they saw an excellent chance to seize an estate, but under such circumstances it was not easy to excite the suspicion of some lawyers. Many members of the bar are on the qui vive for a pretext to loot an estate, as was evident when Mrs. Craven produced her spurious deeds. The shadiest kind of a claim looks plausible to their eager eyes. But it is high time to discourage such dangerous fakers as Mrs. Craven and Virginia Hutchings. I have been told that the Santa Rosa judge who heard the Tanzer case suggested that the facts be brought to the attention of the grand jury. I should like to know if the somnolent Bar Association has any interest in the matter.

Those Reincarnated Angels

There has been some talk of proceedings to have a guardian appointed to take charge of the person and estate of Mrs. L. P. Drexler, who has been figuring so prominently in the cult of the "reincarnated angels" in Mrs. Russell's ocean beach resort. The relatives of the wealthy lady seriously doubt whether she is mentally sound. They regard with suspicion the management of the unusual household whose members deem it advisable to have the surgeon's knife applied to their amatory proclivities and to the cutting of Cupid's bowstring. Mrs. Drexler is undoubtedly a sincere woman and intent upon relieving distress. She was quite poor herself once, and it has been suggested that that is why she takes pleasure in aiding those in distress.

When Mrs. Drexler was Miss Kelly

The story of her marriage to L. P. Drexler, the millionaire, is an interesting one. She is the daughter of an industrious Irishman named Kelly, who worked as a woodchopper in Mendocino county many years ago. He was the brother of Mrs. Blair, the mother of Jennie Blair. And, by the way, it was shortly after Mrs. Blair, Miss Kelly that was, joined her brother in Mendocino county that she met Captain Blair, who later became her husband. The Blairs, like nearly all our wealthy society people of today, were of humble origin, a circumstance which none should have occasion to regret. Captain Blair had worked on a sailing schooner, and one day the captain died at sea. Blair took charge of the vessel and navigated it into port. Thereupon he was given charge of the vessel and with it he laid the foundation of his fortune.

The Match

The Blairs came into prominence socially when they took up their residence in Van Ness avenue and began to mingle in the old Fair set. Elise Kelly, who is now the wealthy Mrs. Drexler, lived with the family, and the match with millionaire Drexler was made by a friend of the Blairs, a lady to whom the old bachelor had proposed. She rejected his suit, but promised to introduce him to a pretty girl. He declared that he could not fall in love by pre-arrangement. Nevertheless, the introduction was effected, and old Drexler declared on the spot that he was in love, and he promptly asked Miss Kelly to become his wife. And thus it was that the millions were acquired which are now being devoted to the furtherance of Mrs. Russell's cult.

Alluring Dorothy Usner Sued

Complaisant Dorothy Usner has been sued by Maurice Reaves for the recovery of a lot of bric-a-brac and money. I suppose Reaves, like many another man, has awakened from his dream over La Belle Dame Sans Merci, and knowing there is no means of recovering his lost emotions is trying to square the matter by recovering as much as possible of his depleted pocketbook. Of course the rumor is out that she jilted him. Of what man hasn't that been said who has looked longingly into the languishing, alluring eyes of the fair Dorothy. She knows full well how to play her part both on and off the stage and no one can give her pointers on how to dress for it. In fact—well, there are many tales that keep alive on the Rialto through the sheer liveliness her daring personality has infused into them.

Her Business Venture in Photographs

She went to Australia with Nat Goodwin. The company and the trip became memorable through subsequent developments. The same venture led to Maxine Elliott's rise. The first spiceful outburst reached here when Dorothy Usner returned to San Francisco in a huff and declared that she had been forced to leave the company on account of the jealousy of Maxine Elliott. Later on letters came from the company saying that she had been dismissed on account of certain photographs that had been taken of her that rivaled anything ever shown by Sapho or Circe. The poses were original, some of them being taken with her sitting in trees, the twigs and leaves arranged in such a delicate and artistic manner as to arouse admiring exclamations even from enthusiastic connoisseurs. No one ever looked on them in a pulseless, disinterested way. They were sold only to the most intimate friends, souvenirs, you know, to remind them of a successful actress on the stage and a charming friend off it. I believe the cheapest of them brought twenty-five dollars. Exceptionally fine ones, done in extremely swell style and pose, were held for at the price individual taste would consent to pay. It was in the interest of art and was high art work, and was too costly to give away, of course. Bougereau himself paints his classical canvases and sells his famous works in a like manner.

The Wife was Finally Appeased

These photographs couldn't have created a greater stir in certain circles if they had been placed on public exhibition. When the wife of the photographer learned that he had been devoting his time to making such classical poses she separated from him. It took him the better part of a year to assure her that he was simply in art for art's sake and that the whole matter was simply a business proposition. Everybody who bought the photographs said the same eventually. If they got any costly experience with them—well, que voulez vous, even those art lovers who go to Europe and invest in classical pictures are sometimes cozened by unconscionable dealers. I wonder what kind of bric-a-brac the present suit is over and whether the alluring Dorothy has any of her classical pictures mixed up in it?

An Imposing Church Spectacle

The sentiment expressed by Jennie Blair in connection with the high-hat-in-church controversy was the most sensible of all. She is of the opinion that the high pulpit should be erected to relieve the strain on rubber necks in church. One divine is of the opinion that if women were compelled to remove their hats they would then demand looking-glasses to see if they had put them on straight. In the old days of St. John's Presbyterian church in Post street, a lady who is now with the majority always hied herself to the sexton's room in the vestibule of Dr. Scott's pastorate and there performed some of the last mysteries of the toilet before the mirror. Then while the sexton held open the door and after her husband had kicked her train into position, she swung into church and down her aisle to the pew in front. It was very imposing. After her death her husband married his trained nurse.

One of the McAllisters

A McAllister in a divorce suit! And one of the family of a much beloved clergyman, too! The case has revived recollections of the Rev. Marion McAllister for whom the old Church of the Advent in Howard street was built in the early sixties. The consecration of that church was a great event owing to the high social standing of the family of the rector. The Rev. Marion McAllister was a brother of the late Hall McAllister and of Ward McAllister.

In Gotham's Gay Whirl

Among the Californians in New York are Kate Douglas Wiggin Rigg looking as sprightly and as debonair as when she was a member of the old Fortnightly club in this city. R. P. Flaglor, erstwhile a Market street photographer, is now a member of a firm with interests involving large capital. He spends the greater part of the year in New York—on the way to being a millionaire. Mrs. Leila Ellis, once a leading elocutionist and Delsartean of this city, is now keeping a swell boarding house in New York city. Her house is the headquarters for Californians among whom may be named Mrs. Bessie Stewart Hooker—the daughter of Nevada's senior Senator, now in the milliner business in the metropolis. Mrs. Ellis' daughter, Leila, who will be remembered as a bright young girl possessed of considerable dramatic ability, later a student in the Wheatcroft school of acting, is engaged to a very wealthy New Yorker. The marriage will soon take place. Mrs. Ellis' son was in the Philippines and is now stationed in one of the Dakotahs.

The California Club

The political pot is boiling in the California club. There are those who declare that the salvation of the club depends upon the retention of Mrs. White in the presidency, and there are others who are for anything for a change no matter how revolutionary. The different sections are at work electing their delegates or representatives in the nominating conventions, and the lines are being drawn between the pro-White and the anti-White factions. But there are two certainties which the California club must face. The first is that if the club desires to build a clubhouse it had better retain Mrs. White as its president, since not a few of the largest subscribers to the clubhouse fund have declared their intention to withdraw their subscriptions in case Mrs. White should not be president the following year. In fact, they have decided not to pay until after the election. The other certainty is that there is no power, no combination in the California club strong enough to carry Mrs. Sharon into office again, and it is said that the lady in question realizes that clubs as well as republics are ungrateful.

"Pall Malls" and Society Belles

The cosmopolitanism of San Francisco was never more apparent, together with its extreme provincialism, than when the cigarette smoking episode at the Palace Ladies' Grill, which would have been unnoticed in a European capital, was so sharply commented on by the local papers and in society circles. The history of tobacco smoking in England is by no means of modern date, as far as women are concerned. It has been of no unusual occurrence, for decades past, to see the leaders of the haut ton indulging in their after-dinner cigar. Cigarettes, however, are a comparatively modern dissipation. The Duchess of Edinburgh, who is a member of the Russian Imperial Family, Princess Henry of Pless, who married a German, the ex-Empress Eugenie, and Mrs. George Keppel are more responsible than any one else for the cigarette smoking craze of late, and what prevails in London of course reaches New York. Naturally San Francisco soon follows and shortly we shall see the wave creeping Eastward again to Chicago; for, strange to say, San Francisco follows the fashion and is in closer touch with New York than Chicago, notwithstanding the latter's geographical proximity. It is interesting to learn how, sometimes, fashionable fads create opportunities for lucky individuals. It was only a few years ago that a scion of England's nobility, with nothing better to do, for he had hunted and smoked and gambled nearly his last sovereign away, started, in Pall Mall, London, a little tobacco shop, where he sold society folks their cigarettes. With his influence and connections he was soon taken up, and the "Pall Mall Cigarettes," as they were called, were sold everywhere; and from the momentary caprice of a few fashionable women sprang up a fortune and an enormous factory, and now the lucky possessor of this cigarette is said to own the favorite for next year's Derby.

His Ideal of Marriage

In a recent letter to a friend here Dr. Felix Adler sets forth his interesting views on wedlock. "Happiness," he says, "is not the goal of marriage. If you make happiness the object of marriage you cannot escape the conclusion that unhappy marriages ought to be dissolved. And if that be the case, and higher thought will admit of dissolving marriages, the contracting parties will look for new copartnerships and again find that marirage is unhappy, and thus go on and on. With such a custom we would soon find ourselves in a society where the most abominable of all abominations exists, commonly but incorrectly termed free love. It is incorrectly termed so because it is neither love nor is it free.

Finding Life's Problem in Wedlock

"Happiness, then, is not the goal of marriage but its token. It is not the gladness that we get out of it, but the pleasure that we give to others that makes the idea of happiness in marriage elevating. The object of marriage is that two persons shall dwell together in life constantly and in the most intimate relations, in order that each may help the other to solve the problem of their lives. Each must see the other's defects and suggest and help toward the working-out of personality."

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

Friends here of J. Mona Lesser have just received tidings that he dropped dead on the steps of the Court House, Boston, a few days ago. Judge Lesser was very well known here and in Central and South America in the eartly seventies. He had a host of friends. Very soon after passing the age limit he was admitted to the San Francisco bar. Promotion quickly followed. He became a member of the legislature and shortly afterwards was appointed Superior Judge. He went to Boston fifteen years ago where he continued to rank high in his profession. His brother was Surgeon-in-Chief in Cuba, during the recent war.

He Disliked Notoriety

There were many points in common between the late Ed Sheldon and Winfield Jones. They both had any number of women friends, but both died without leaving ties of either wife or flame. "Winnie" Jones used to give all sorts of delightful functions at his house in Hyde street near Washington, but it was rarely that any account of his teas, dejeuners or dinners found its way into the papers. Mr. Jones abhorred publicity. A young woman who was getting up an article for one of the Sunday supplements on our bachelor hosts went to "Winnie" Jones for permission to send a photographer to kodak his reception, sleeping and dining rooms. He listened to her with polite attention but when she had finished he answered, "Madame, my house is my castle. You may write what you will about me, I cannot prevent that, but while I live the interior of my house is my own." His manner was courtly but his refusal was definite. The young woman satisfied herself with having the photographer take an exterior view of Mr. Jones' residence.

Still Cling to Love of "Dobbs Terry"

There were several unexpected small teas and luncheons last week with Eastern visitors as the raison d'etre. Mrs. Henry Crocker hurried out cards to meet Mrs. Clover, who was Dora Miller, always a favorite in local society. Georgie Hopkins gave a smart and select on Wednesday afternoon. The luncheon was in honor of a Dobbs Ferry schoolmate, Mrs. Wainwright, who is out here on her wedding trip. There is an unwritten law that the "Dobbs" girls shall cling close as brothers. All of the Hopkins', Mary Scott-Martin and Caro Crockett-Scott are graduates of that select school. The college virus has never attacked any member of that inner circle bounded on the north by the Hagers, on the west by the Scotts, on the south by the Hopkins' and on the east by the McBeans. Therese Morgan did go to Farmington, but that is only a cross between a seminary and college. Flora Dean-Magee, Anna Voorhies-Bishop and two or three others in the smart set wear college pins, but the average San Francisco society girl prefers boarding-school fudge parties to Greek plays at college.

A Death Bed Dance

George Primrose, the minstrel, has just written on here to a friend an account of the pathetic end of his old partner, Billy West. West was dying in a Chicago hotel and hearing that Primrose was in town with his company sent for him. He was suffering the tortures of cancer and his eyes were fast dimming, but he begged George to grant his last request: that was to bring up a bunch of his crack dancers into the room and have them do their level best. Primrose sent around to the theatre and had the best teams in the show brought up to West's rooms. The dying minstrel's eyes glistened with delight when he was propped up in bed so that he could watch them go through their fancy steps. They kept it up for nearly an hour and then the light in the burning eyes began to fade and the pleased expression to dim on the pain-creased face. At a signal from Primrose the dancers stole out of the room and the weakened old minstrel, almost crying with delight, was laid out on his bed again. Gradually the light grew dark in his eyes but the pleased expression never left his face; it was there when the end came.

He Left a Big Fortune

West's death was almost coincident with that of the greatest burnt cork artist of them all, Billy Emerson. Come easy, go easy, was Emerson's financial motto, and in his happy-go-lucky, whole-hearted way he lived up to it. The latter part of his life was cared for by a few staunch friends. Billy West was no niggard with his money but he didn't have that insatiable gambling mania to which Emerson was addicted and he left something like half a million dollars. A big part of this was made in the minstrel business, but the most of it he inherited from his second wife. Very few people know that his first wife was Fay Templeton. He lived only a short time with her. After she got the divorce he married Lizette Morris. She left him a fortune when she died. Afterwards he married one of the Hanley sisters, Lizzie, I think it was. Primrose, Dockstadter and Wilson are about the only ones left now of the glorious old-time burnt cork stars.

Bishop Nichols' Mot

Now that Bishop Nichols has been appointed to the Hawaiian diocese, his famous bon mot upon The Right Reverent Willis, the incumbent Bishop of the Islands, would seem to become a matter of historic humor. Bishop Willis will be remembered as the tall, thin old gentleman who appeared before the Episcopal convention in knee-breeches and emaciated calves, and gave a somewhat long and late-for-dinner talk upon "What I have done for Honolulu and why you should not put me out of there," at the end of which talk it suddenly appeared to most of the convention that maybe he ought to be put out after all. They wondered how so fat a position could produce so lean a clergyman and feared lest the good man was starving himself to help the poor. Later in the day, Bishop Nichols was approached by a member from New Jersey.

"There is some rumor, Bishop," said the Eastern member, "of Bishop Willis resigning and of the Senate sending you to take his place. What do you think about it?"

"What do I think about it?" exclaimed Bishop Nichols. Then he stopped and smiled. "I'm afraid," he said, "that that will not be a case of Barkis is willin',' but more probably, of 'Willis's barkin'."

And Willis has barked with a vengeance.

He has the Measles

Dr. Kierstadt, whose engagement to Edith McBean was recently announced, is seriously ill and his father is hurrying from the East to his bedside. At first it was reported that Dr. Kierstadt was suffering from pneumonia but now the case has developed into inward measles. It was necessary to perform an operation to remove a gathering and at present the Doctor is in a critical state. Miss McBean is devoting all her time to her fiance these Lenten days and friends are anxiously awaiting favorable bulletins from the sick room.

One of a Faithful Band

The news of the death of Kate Hutchinson brought sadness to many hearts. For years she was identified with good work in Episcopal church circles, and her death was a loss to that band of faithful, devoted workers who have remained loyal to Grace church. There are many of our society people who can recall the Hutchinson girls as bright chubby little children in the palmy days of Grace Cathedral school. And a swell private school that was, too. It was held in the assembly rooms of Grace church at the corner of California and Stockton streets. Those were the days when the Episcopalians cherished hopes of having Grace church become the Bishop's church, and were pleased to call it Grace Cathedral. In that school were numbered the very elite of San Francisco. Besides the daughters of General Hutchinson were the daughters of Judge Thornton, of William Duncan, of Tom Poulterer, of Bolton, the banker, of Harry Williams of the Pacific Mail, and the grandchildren of "Uncle" Joe Clement. In those days, Joe Clement's son, Eph, was a gay young blade with a host of admirers. Eph's daughter is the well-known society girl, Kate Clement, who became the heroine of a yachting trip about a year ago.

A Blingum Leader's Romance

The smart set has its ears attuned for the first hint from Cupid that George Newhall has been wooed from bachelordom. Mr. Newhall has been paying his devoirs to a charming society girl for two seasons and the news of their engagement will not come as a surprise. This will be a very pretty ending to his life romance, for he was once supposed to be interested in her older sister, now a happy matron with several bairns of her own. At the time that Mr. Newhall was in the field for "big sister's" favor his most formidable rival bore the same given name. "The war of the Georges" some one dubbed the tournament of hearts and for a long time even the blind archer himself could not have picked the winner. Both men were considered the king-fish in the matrimonial pond and many a fond matchmaker grieved that they should burn their incense at the same altar. When the fortunate maiden finally announced her choice it was the "other George" who won her heart and hand. Mr. Newhall was for years tagged a hopeless bachelor but of late he has been so attentive to the sister of his first fancy that the gossips are wondering. There is no reason why the first attachment should smudge the rose of this one. Those versed in the law and lore of love say that it takes a second affair to make a lover worth having.

The Nation's Rough House

This is an exceptionally stormy session of Congress. The disgraceful row between Senators Tillman and McLaurin of South Carolina is only one of many "rough-house" scenes that have recently been enacted in the nation's capital. Many of our statesmen have become experts in the use of billingsgate, and the dignity of both Houses is often in jeopardy. Not many days ago Representative Wheeler of Kentucky made a rowdy speech, in which he said that "the Secretary of State was a pitiable flunky who should be booted out of the State Department." He referred to Captain Clark of the Navy and General James H. Wilson of the Army as shoulder-strapped, gold-laced flunkies, because they were to represent the United States at the Coronation. He assailed President Roosevelt for consenting to the presence of his daughter and railed at the American people for their hospitality to Prince Henry of Russia, whom he called "a little Dutchman." Yet Mr. Wheeler is from that State whose people are famed for their hospitality and courteous treatment of guests, their regard for the amenities of life and their jealousy of the country's honor and good name.

A Bold Challenge

Senator Tillman, the Southern gentleman who provoked his colleague McLaurin into calling him a liar, and then precipitated a fist fight on the floor of the Senate, is a popular man in South Carolina, notwithstanding his pot-house tactics. He is one of those oddly honest men who are skeptical of the integrity of everybody else. McLaurin was originally a Tillman man, but deserted the latter's ranks. Hence the antipathy of Tillman. Some time ago Tillman challenged McLaurin to resign and to go back to South Carolina and begin a new contest for the Senate. But McLaurin did not care to indulge in such a test of strength. Tillman is a fire-eater and he has frequently denounced the big men of the Senate as frauds to their teeth. No doubt they would like to get rid of him.

Achieved Success East and West

When Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson comes this way in the spring, she will find many old schoolmates with whom to renew old acquaintance. As Ailene Ivers, there was no more popular girl in society than she. She was the beauty of the Denman school at the time that such stunning girls as Belle Brooks (now Mrs. Jack Reis), Manie Haskell (Mrs. Poore), Bessie Garvey (Mrs. Wilcox), Clara Wall, Lulu Perry (Mrs. Bryant), Florence Cox, Lillian Harrison (Mrs. McElroy) and others were pupils there. When she made her debut in the swim no other girl, unless it were Nellie Joliffe or Mamie Blethen, was so much admired. Her beauty was of the fairest, most ethereal blonde type, and I am told she has changed not at all since her girlhood's days. When she went East she made as great a hit in the New York swim as here, and her engagement to Edward Robinson followed very shortly upon her advent there. He was a few years her junior and he had wealth enough to make up for her lack of a dower. The Robinsons lived in Philadelphia until lately, when they joined the Newport set. Manipulating Gas Stock

Two weeks ago the stockholders of the San Francisco Gas and Electric Light company were excited over the sudden rise of their stock in the market. Before the last annual election of directors, at which J. B. Crockett and Bishop & Co. were overwhelmingly defeated, Rudolph Spreckels, through his numerous touts, made many promises, one of them being that if he were elected the price of the stock would be enhanced. But after the election the stock went down, and the Spreckels' push began to worry until some one made the happy suggestion that a circular letter to the stockholders be issued. The effect of the letter was to induce a few gullible people to buy a little stock at as high a figure as fifty dollars a share. But the general public was not baited, and the stock went back to the figure at which it stood several weeks ago. It is now generally understood that the purpose of the letter was to boom the stock.

Dissatisfied Stockholders

There is much grumbling among the stockholders of the corporation. They are sure that they did well in getting rid of the men who had for many years controlled the corporation, but they doubt whether those that have been substituted are the right men in the right place. Instead of effecting a compromise with Claus Spreckels the new directors have kept up the feud between the rival corporations. The Independent Electric Light and Power company has begun to lay pipes and to build gas works with the intention of fighting the old company as vigorously in the gas business as it has already done in the electric. The stockholders have been asked to give to the Spreckels' combination an option on their stock for two years, but they appear to prefer to handle their own stock. They do not believe that the new directors are willing to incur heavy monetary loss in behalf of others, and hence the failure of the bait held out by the California Title Insurance company in behalf of the present management.

Two Talented Sisters

Bessie Lee Wall showed considerable strength of character in marrying a man who so lately enjoyed such newspaper notoriety as did Samuel Cheyney. But then Bessie Wall was always a girl of remarkable independence of thought. She carried her original ideas into everything she undertook. She is a highly educated musician and had she not chosen the domestic life might have made fame and fortune on the concert stage. Independence is also a striking characteristic of Mrs. Cheyney's sister, Lou Wall, who has earned for herself a place among the best of San Francisco's artists. When she returned from study abroad everybody thought that Lou Wall would do something with her talents, and she did not disappoint expectation. She not only exhibited and sold her paintings, but after a time she took a position in the art department of the Bulletin, where her work at once commanded attention and admiration. The Walls are related to all the high and mighty in Oakland and the fact that the sisters believed in putting their talents to financial account has never debarred them from admission to the homes of the elect. They have been, if anything, more sought after than if they had remained lilies of the field.

A Fatal Resemblance

Congressman Loud has become one of the notable figures in Washington. San Francisco should be proud of him. He is pointed out to visitors as the man that objects to paying decent wages to letter-carriers, and who insisted upon having a letter-carrier discharged for daring to criticise him. Yet, less than a decade ago this distinguished statesman was earning meagre wages as a journeyman shoe-maker in a local factory. He drifted into pot-house politics and became a deputy tax-collector. Later on he was refused the nomination for the Assembly and about that time the Republican candidate for Congress in the Fifth district was attacked with cold feet. To pacify Loud he was given the nomination which was looked upon as a gold brick, but through the political blunders of his opponent he was elected. He began to regard himself as a man of destiny, and when somebody in Washington told him that he resembled Grant he was convinced that he was a great man. He immediately trimmed his beard to increase the likeness, and he has been a joke at the capital ever since. He is the only man in Congress who

Cuspidors to be Tabu

There will be at least one innovation (or it might more properly be called a renovation) in the new Oelrichs hotel that is to be: there will be no cuspidors. Gentlemen desirous of using such dark age utensils will be allowed to traverse the corridor to the rear end of the building which will be erected over a bluff and there expectorate down the abyss, trusting as they do so that the excrement will be diffused ere it reaches the heads of pedestrians in the street below. It is just possible that some sort of gateway, such as is used by railroads at street crossings will be arranged to drop and arrest traffic while the gentlemen perform this thor-r-roughly American task. It was all decided at a little gathering in New York.

"It would be so clevah," said a dapper little American, "to have these fountain cuspidors. I heah there is not one of them on the West coast."

"Cuspidoahs?" said an Englishman present, "cuspidoahs! Ugh!"

"Cuspidors," said Mrs. Oelrichs, "cuspidors? Ugh!"

Then rising like the modern heroine who has been offered ten dollars to poison her sister's pet dog, she exclaimed: "In my hotel, there will be no cuspidors!"

"But what of the gentlemen who wish to smoke?" queried the little American.

"If you expect to expectorate in my hotel," replied the lady, "you may expect to expectorate—off the back porch."

"—— off the back porch," murmured the crowd, and thus has been brought about the suggestion of traffic gates with a flagman at the corner.

To Live Here

The family of Colonel Dudley C. Evans, the new president of Wells, Fargo & Co., is at present sojourning at Coronado Beach. The Evans' intend living in San Francisco and should be quite an addition to the social life here. Colonel Evans is a cousin of Mrs. Anna Cox Stephens, the noted scholar and writer, formerly of this city and later of Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. T. Rinaldo of San Jose will make this city their future home. They now have apartments at the Hotel Majestic. They were residents of San Jose for thirty-two years. Mr. Rinaldo is the senior member of the firm of Rinaldo Bros. & Co., and the founder of the firm.

Agile Mrs. Martin

Mrs. Eleanor Martin, for her years, is the sprightliest woman I know. She can keep up under the strain of a round of gayety that would break down a debutante. Now she is back to plunge into it all once more. At the Phelan ball she delighted and amazed every one by the agility with which she danced the Virginia reel. Her return from Los Angeles so shortly after the arrival of Mrs. Oelrichs was a mere coincidence, but somebody started the report that she came up to try to win "Tessie" over to Peter's cause. I have always understood, however, and upon reliable authority, that Peter was anxious for somebody to win his sensible mamma over to "Lily's" cause. Perhaps "Tessie" has undertaken to perform that kind office for him. The drought having passed, perhaps it may be easier to induce Mrs. Martin to loosen her purse strings.

Mrs. Grace Morei Dickman has moved her studio to 516 Sutter street, and has changed her reception day to Thursday, from three to five.

Feasting Instead of Fasting

The smart set does not appear to be keeping the penitential period with any degree of fervor. "It is not fashionable to be pious this year" was the remark of one of the season's buds at a recent tea, and it about sizes up the situation. It had been hoped that when the Lenten season arrived there would be some rest from the round of luncheons, dinners, teas and dances the swim had been giving for weeks, but, oh dear, no! the Lenten fast has been turned into the Lenten feast. It is rumored that the clergy—at least those of the Episcopal church—are meditating a protest to their flocks from the pulpit. But times have changed since the memorable pastoral letter written by poor, dear old Bishop Kip, which struck terror to those who took part in the Sunday drives and picnics which William C. Ralston gave at Belmont years ago. Notably affected was Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, who participated in some of them and who after the publication of the Bishop's letter was doubly devout as a sort of make-up for previous derelictions.

Some of the Doings

The friends of Mrs. Oelrichs have availed themselves of her visit as a pretext for lavish entertainments. She has entertained so many Californians in the East that the number of her hosts and hostesses has largely increased of late years and she is not permitted to note the absence of Mrs. de Young or the death of Mrs. O'Connor, who, in conjunction with Mrs. Blair, were formerly her most prominent entertainers. Another lady who will serve as the motif for several functions is Mrs. Catherwood-Darling, who is said to be reveling in the prospect of the litigation to be precipitated by her daughter, Mrs. de la Montagne. Every one at all familiar with the charming matron knows how she delights in legal tangles. Whether it is the clever brain inherited from her father, Judge Hastings, that loves to undo tangles, the fact remains she always enters the legal arena con amore. She has successfully contested her father's deeds of trust, and fought her brothers, Robert and Dio, for an accounting, secured letters of guardianship over her sister's person and estate, and compelled her brother-in-law, W. Scott Keyes, to surrender various articles of furniture and oil paintings.

Century Club Dissipation

What a gay winter this has been socially! Not only have the buds had a good time, but the old ladies had a dance of their own when the dowagers of the Century club danced the minuet one afternoon in all the glory of Colonial costume and powdered hair. Rather selfishly—it seemed to outsiders—the ladies decreed to keep it entirely to themselves. Only members of the club were admitted to view the dance, but the affair was such a success it had to be repeated in the evening, and it has leaked out how magnificent Mrs. J. F. Swift looked, how stately Mrs. Tubbs, how full of merriment Mrs. George Oulton and how dainty Mrs. Kauffman. A very pretty feature of the afternoon's pleasure was the dancing of two little tots of children who did their pas seuls with admirable effect, though a naughty, malicious outsider remarked that it was an illustration of that line from the popular hymn which runs "From youth to hoary age."

A Plucky Family

The Friedlander girls are still very ill and their friends pray heartily for their speedy convalescence. They worked very hard during the winter, capping their labors with the great feat of the Huntington ball, for which they did all the catering. But the after effects of that coup was physical collapse. The Friedlanders have a tremendous amount of pluck, which they inherited from the founder of the family fortunes. In the seventies, Isaac Friedlander was called the "Grain King" and ranked among the multi-millionaires. A crash in wheat shrunk the millions to hundred-thousands, which were his family's inheritance. This fortune went all to pieces some time ago and not a shred remained to the daughters except the family silver and a few heirlooms. Isaac Friedlander was an othodox Jew, but his family did not keep to the faith of their forefathers. When one of his daughters married Augustus Bowie, who is a Maryland Catholic, she embraced his religion. Carey Friedlander missed a good chance of bracing up his sisters' fortunes when he failed a few years ago to take the golden gift held out to him during a stay in Chicago. A millionaire pork-packer's widow fell desperately in love with him, but he did not return her affection. He stayed a bachelor until Cupid hit his heart simultaneously with that of a pretty Los Angeles girl.

Passing of Mrs. Murphy

There never was a woman of more generous and kind impulses than Mrs. B. D. Murphy, whose recent death caused a shock throughout this State. By her death the poor and needy lost a most gracious benefactor. The old Murphy homestead, near San Jose, where Mrs. Murphy passed away, has been the scene of many brilliant entertainments in the years agone. The last general reunion of the family, held in honor of the golden wedding of Martin Murphy and his wife, was attended by large throngs of friends, and a royal entertainment was furnished. The old house on the Murphy estate was brought around the Horn from Boston, in '49, and has occupied its present site for fifty-three years. Martin Murphy and wife lived there continuously for over forty years, and three generations have been born there. It was thirty-three years ago that Mrs. B. D. Murphy, whose funeral took place from the historic home, entered it as a bride.

Some Mere Rumors

Rumors that Cupid has turned his back in despair on the heart affairs of a wedded pair of half a year come with every breeze that blows from the Paradise of the Pacific. When Eleanor Gallagher of San Francisco became the bride of Attorney-General Dole of Hawaii last September there were not wanting carping friends to foresee unhappiness. They saw in their jaundiced minds' eyes the inevitable friction between a young woman and a man past his youth. Now they are rejoicing at their prophecies coming true and are whispering, "I told you so," to one another. Though married in September, Mrs. Dole has seen little of her husband. The honeymoon trip was from this city to Honolulu, where the groom has a job paying him three thousand dollars a year, and where his cousin, Sanford B. Dole, is the first citizen, as Governor of the Territory of Hawaii. Attorney General Dole was not expected to marry. He is a well-fed, shiny-pated, over-heated and always-tired man, nearly fifty years of age, and is a devotee of Bacchus. It was not supposed that Venus ever heard his orisons, and most of his time was given to listening to the soft, insidious music of the native musicians who play every few nights on the piazzas of the Hawaiian Hotel where General Dole has abided for long.

That Tired Feeling

With the General, Bacchus and Morpheus were close allies, and he has been wont to nod in the evenings until some abrupter motion overbalanced him and brought notions of a bed and mosquito net—they always go together in Hawaii. Now there are folk who say that the cause of Mrs. Dole's leaving the Pearl of the Pacific while the honeymoon was yet supposedly nascent, was the same unfortunate habit of nodding. Like Colonel Kowalsky and Captain Barnes, General Dole will fall asleep at the most inopportune moments. At important meetings he will blink when the fate of the Territory trembles in the balance, and it is said that Cupid became disgusted with this failing of his middle-aged disciple. Surely it would be provoking to have one's new husband snore while one poured out the sweet things stored in a loving wife's heart. However, there is no clatter of a separation and as General Dole is to arrive here soon on his way to Washington, the bracing air of the mainland may mend matters.

The Prince of Promoters

There are few promoters more skilled in the art of separating men of wealth from their superfluous cash than is the genial Prince Poniatowski of Blingum. That the Prince has convinced certain multi-millionaires of New York that it would be wise for them to invest their money in a new railroad in this State, I have not the slightest doubt. That would not be a great feat for Prince Poniatowski to perform. He has persuaded some of the most cautious and close-fisted of our local capitalists to loosen up for the purpose of engaging in hazardous speculation, and a man that can do that should have no difficulty in winning the confidence of the rich men of New York who are looking for all sorts of schemes in which to invest their money.

The most delightfully blended whisky known to the human palate is "Jesse Moore"—the standard for over fifty years.

Some Knockers

Some of the people, including Will Crocker, who have felt the Poniatowski's hypnotic touch, and who did not possess the requisite staying qualities, have been trying to knock him. They declare that he is not a practical financier, but I have never heard of his losing any large sums of money. He is a successful promoter so far as Poniatowski is concerned, and I have great confidence in his railroad project. There is room for more railroads in this State, and if Eastern financiers are correct in their prognostications concerning the future of California now is the time for them to send their capital in this direction. If the Crockers have lost confidence in Poniatowski he should be congratulated on having won that of the Goulds.

"Yes. I've got to move," explained Flattery to his sympathizing friend; "my wife is ailing all the time in the small quarters where we live. The doctor says there isn't room for improvement."

The Iroquois Endorsement

The State League of Iroquois clubs, whose main distinction is its endowment of Max Popper with political prestige, has endorsed Dr. Dodge for Governor. Still, that can do him no harm. The Iroquois clubs are composed of stalwart Democrats. Those who do not hold office have held office, or else they hope to hold office. At one time when Cleveland was President ninety-eight members of the local club were tax-eaters. It must therefore be conceded that the Iroquois braves are active Democrats and that their endorsement should amount to something. If they were not permitted to select our Governors and other public officials, how could they expect to hold their jobs?

He is considered an expert on the marriage state, and a higher critic of the tie that binds. According to his friends, what he doesn't know about brides, bridegrooms, honeymoons, mother-in-laws and the other conditions and blisses of wedded life, is utterly unworthy of being known. Some of his most brilliant mots are as follows:

I have married two couples in ten minutes. That's speedy work; twelve knots an hour.

I would rather marry a headless heart than a heartless head.

When a young man asks me at the end of the ceremony what I charge, I ask him, loud enough to be heard, "What is she worth?"

You may marry a very rich man and get a poor husband.

A man may be the head of the house but the woman is the neck, and I never saw a neck that couldn't turn the head unless the neck was too stiff.

Love is a delightful diet but ham and eggs do come handy at times.

Most inmates of our prisons are single men.

If there are any of you married couples unhappy, go home and play for a week at getting engaged.

The man who tells the minister he will call tomorrow and pay the marriage fee usually fails to find the house. He is like the fellow who goes to church with a cotton umbrella and returns home with a silk one.

Anecdotes of Judge Budd

Judge Joseph H. Budd, who died at his home in Stockton last Sunday night, was one of the most widely known and highly respected jurists of this State. He belonged to the old school, his admission to the bar dating back nearly sixty years. Though he had passed his eightieth milestone, he was in the full enjoyment of his faculties up to the time of his death, and as late as last January he attended to the business of his court. Twenty years ago Judge Budd was a practicing attorney in Stockton, and his son, now so well known as Governor Jim, was also engaged in the practice of law there. One day they appeared as opposing counsel in a case. During the trial the man who afterwards became Governor of the State made a statement which drew forth a protest from the old gentleman.

"I never heard," he said, "such an absurd proposition of law advanced by a respectable attorney."

"If your Honor please," said James H. Budd, "all the law I know I learned from counsel on the other side."

Voluntary Imprisonment

In the early sixties Judge Budd became engaged in a case which had something of the flavor of the Alturas trial in Modoc county. He was associated with W. L. Dudley and Sam Booker, and the case was tried before District Judge Charles W. Creaner. There was a deal of torrid repartee in the case and one day Attorney Booker was adjudged guilty of contempt of court and sentenced to twenty-four hours' imprisonment. Budd and Dudley, believing that they were guilty, too, voluntarily went to jail also. They first purchased a bountiful supply of food, wines and cigars, and that night the three disciples of Blackstone burned the Sheriff's midnight oil over a game of poker.

Blanding to be a Farmer

Poor Tevis Blanding! In spite of the fact that he will some day have a million he appears to have the fatal Tevis heritage of unhappiness. A few years ago when he was drifting into debt his father took him out of school and sent him to the oil fields of Bakersfield to work with the common laborers at daily wages. His father promised to give him a trip around the world if he stuck to his job for a few years, but he grew tired and quit at the end of about eighteen months. Nevertheless, he went abroad. Now he is en route to Mexico to try his hand at farming.

When Bob Rushed Mabel

There seems to be no doubt that Mabel Hopkins has lost her heart to Charley Quinn the turfman. I hear that Mrs. Hopkins is not o'er pleased with the match and is constantly on the alert to circumvent an elopement. Mrs. Hopkins has had one scare in this line and is evidently determined that Cupid shall not catch her napping again. It was while in Paris that Miss Mabel met that chesty heart-breaker Rob Bien. Chief among his assets was a basso voice that is said to lift a maiden off her feet—the same dulcet tones that have since dented Mae Perkins' cardiac organ and won the heart and "I will" of Miss Peck of Chicago. But while the vocal manicures of Paris were shaping his voice he found time to rush Miss Hopkins. Their affection grew like Jack's bean stalk and sprouted tender missives, mayhap an engagement ring, and unquestionably their thoughts were two-stepping altarward at a very lively rate, before Mamma realized what was happening.

Frustrated by Mamma

It was arranged to slip off one morning before breakfast and surprise Mamma with a son-in-law. The question of sordid lucre had to be considered and as Bien was a remittance man, Miss Hopkins agreed to mesmerize enough money to bridge the time between the "Never darken my door again" and "God bless you, my children" act. But somehow their plans trickled to Mrs. Hopkins' ears and she sent them glimmering. When they met again in San Francisco it was evident that their ardor had cooled down to the platonic temperature and indeed it was Miss Hopkins who encouraged her erstwhile admirer to transfer his regard to the Senator's daughter. But when Miss Peck of Chicago showed herself not averse to his attentions the young man decided that his bread would be best buttered in that quarter. The Pecks are supposed to have lost a large slice of the wealth that was once theirs but their social position is still twenty-four-carat and they are really not modern rivals of Job's turkey. Mr. Bien left for Chicago with the Pecks on Monday and immediately after the wedding, which is set for an early date, he will take his bride to Paris where the finishing fallals will be put on his voice.

The Launching of Mabel

When Mabel Hopkins first returned from Europe it looked as though her cousins were making room for her in their enviable niche in the smart set. E. W. Hopkins and his brother's widow have been at outs for years but he did not allow his resentment to extend to his niece and his daughters were given carte blanche to launch pretty Miss Mabel. Edna Hopkins-Taylor sent out cards for a luncheon at the University club and Cousin Mabel was presented to the sacred inner circle. Mabel was pronounced chic and altogether adorable and society was willing to be more than polite. About a week later, at a tea, it was learned that a rupture had occurred. But evidently Mabel Hopkins has not bothered her pretty head about it. She has a very independent catholic taste and chooses her friends without reference to the Rev. Nicholls' abridged edition of Ward McAllister. Her marriage to Mr. Quinn is accepted as a certainty by those who know them both.

Sun Shone on the Bride

Robert Bien is going to make a splendid match from all points of view, and the luck of the capricious young singer has aroused the envy of many Chicago beaux who wooed Arline Peck in vain. Miss Peck, by the way, was engaged before but for some reason nobody was ever able to discover why the engagement was broken off. Her former fiance was a brother of Charles Simms, who married her elder sister, Buda Peck. Buda Peck's wedding is still remembered, as a very unique and elaborate affair. It was not solemnized in a Chicago church, but in the little chapel near the Pecks' country-seat in Wisconsin. The bride was carried to the church in a sedan-chair, the bearers being six prominent society men of the windy city. Behind the blushing bride's conveyance came the six bridesmaids, two and two. It was a most original procession and was witnessed by a crowd of gaping villagers. As the festive train entered the church a ray of sunlight slanted directly upon the bride, illuminating her face and figure in a manner that no one who was present has ever forgotten.

Made Up His Mind Long Ago

With the passing of E. J. Colnon of the Stockton Mail the State loses its best known representative of the interior press and one of its brainiest and shrewdest political leaders. He was Jim Budd's Fidus Achates and when the Stockton lawyer reached the governor's chair he testified his regard by giving Colnon what he considered the best offices in his gift. The Stockton editor exercised a strong leverage in his district and had a deal to do with the rise of young de Vries and numbers of others who are now prominent in San Joaquin Valley politics. Till very shortly before his first Los Angeles trip he had no idea he was the victim of an incurable malady. For several years back, though, he complained of not feeling exactly right and was suspicious that in some way his health was undermined. It was about that time that an epidemic of dread Bright's disease ran through the ranks of public men. I remember Jim Budd saying that he knew almost as much about the subject as any specialist. His friends had such a high opinion of his knowledge that they used to ask his opinion on the symptoms. Colnon passed through that period without a qualm. Coming down from Stockton on the train, one day, he remarked to a friend: "I don't seem to be able to pull myself together and enjoy my old-time health. One thing is certain: if ever I discover that I have anything incurable I know how to end it." The story of his last act in Los Angeles confirms what he had in mind.

A Hard Working Girl

Alma de Brettville, whose six weeks' acquaintance with Chas. Anderson cost that gay Klondiker two hundred and eight dollars, thirty-three and a third cents, per, not to speak of the fifteen hundred dollars alleged to have gone in gifts, was a few years ago working as stenographer for "Doc" Gore. She was not more than eighteen years old at that time, but was a full-fledged beauty. Her extreme height made her a marked figure among the business women of downtown commercial circles. After leaving Gore, I am told, she took up leather work, and with her sister visited San Jose, teaching the art of poker sketching and selling the products of their ready fingers. The sisters were very successful, and went as far as Mexico, picking up many new ideas among the leather workers of that country.

Mrs. Oelrichs Danced with Wu

Chinese Minister Wu, whose ireful conversation with ex-Mayor Phelan in Washington last week gave the press East and West much good material for comment, is ordinarily the quietest and most courteous of diplomats. Mrs. Oelrichs, who was a guest at a dinner dance in his honor, given by Mrs. Stuyvesant-Fish at Newport last year, says that she found him very charming. She danced with him and so did Mrs. Fish, Mrs. Charles Pomeroy and others. His valsing was no less ready than his repartee. Wu is an elegant dresser and always carries a Chinese umbrella in his walks abroad. He is probably the cleverest Oriental that ever appeared in the diplomatic corps at the Nation's capital. He is not only the representative of his Emperor to the United States, but also to Peru and Spain.

The Stanford Dance

The Stanford dance last week was not up in point of anything, except the decorations, which were exquisite, to previous balls of the parlor. Few of the old members were there, and not many of the usual set mingled with the dancers. The best attendance was among the lookers-on. As a rule, the Stanford's annual dances have been noted for the beautiful gowns worn by the women, but this year there was a noticeable absence of smart dressing. Nearly all of the frocks worn were high in the neck, and decollete was the exception.

Reillys of Virginia

Every one who has met Robinson Reilly, the new husband of Genevieve Goad, declares him to be a very fine chap. The Reillys it appears are not just ordinary Reillys, but Reillys of Virginia and the daughters have made excellent matches.

Generous Virginia

After visiting the Washington monument I can readily understand the conceit of Virginians. It is indigenous to the soil. Among the many blocks of marble and granite contributed to the monument is one that caught my eye at about the two-hundred-foot level. It was the gift of the State of Virginia, and this is the inscription it bears:

Virginia, that gave Washington to her country, now presents this block of granite to his monument.

Without Virginia, where could we have ever found a Washington?

COLORADO CLAY—ITS REMARKABLE EFFECT UPON THE HAIR.

Turns white hair black, brown, auburn, or Titian red. Restores gray hair to its original color without changing the natural colors. Peroxide ends made to equal the new hair growing out. Bleached hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the clay bath. The strongest shampoo will not affect it, nor does the clay stain the scalp in any particular.

The Blue Page

The Countess de Plessy, young, pretty and vivacious, was immoderately in love with her husband. He, on the contrary, as all Paris knew, was for the time being hopelessly enslaved by a little singer of the Opera, a delicious blonde who had just achieved a triumph in the role of Cherubino. Gossip, or some friend more officious than discreet, soon enough conveyed the story of the Count's infatuation to his wife's ears. She, in despair, lost no time in hurrying off to consult her mentor, Madame X.

Madame X. was an American, a Western woman, as pretty and as foolish as the Countess herself. She listened, sympathized, and advised a course of retaliation.

"But, dear Anna, what can I do?" asked the Countess, through her tears.

Madame X. reflected for a few moments, then jumped up in animation and flung her arms around her friend's neck.

"I have it, I have it," cried she. "In a fortnight it will be Mardi Gras, and the Count will undoubtedly attend the Opera Ball."

"Well?"

"Well, you must go, too. You must go in the character of—guess what? Cherubino."

"Oh, Anna, impossible!"

"Impossible? Not at all. Just listen to me."

And the lively Anna unfolded her plan, a daring one, nothing less than for Lucie to personate Cherubino at the ball and in that character confront the Count.

Anna was an industrious reader of novels, and expected great results from her scheme. She looked forward to the demolition of the little singer, the subjugation of the Count, and the complete victory of Lucie.

"With your figure, your bearing, your chic, it will be easy. Leave the details to me."

The Countess allowed herself to be persuaded. The fetching costume was prepared, and the eventful evening arrived. In the dressing room of Madame X. and with the assistance of her maid, Lucie donned the disguise. It was a ravishing costume of pale blue, satin doublet, silk hose, and velvet cloak. Added to these were tiny shoes and a chapeau with a long white plume, to say nothing of a blonde wig and blue satin masque. When all was done, Lucie could not resist a spasm of fright when she saw the effect in the mirror, notwithstanding the joyous cries of the others who pronounced her a complete triumph. It was rather late to retreat, so the trio entered their carriage and drove to the scene of the ball. Anna and the maid were in dominos.

No sooner was she landed amid the gay throng than the little page had more than her share of attention. She was not used to such rude compliments, such pointed remarks, and shrank from them. She clung nervously to the others, kept as much as possible within the shelter of her cloak, and put on all the dignity she was capable of. Anna, too, was far from being at ease. The femme de chambre, however, who was really the guiding spirit of the adventure, had aplomb enough for the three, and carried things with a high hand. Before long the three women became separated in the throng, and poor Lucie found herself the centre of a waggish crowd which pressed around her from all sides.

The Count and his friend, Paul de Neyrac, did not appear until late. The former was on the watch for his charmer who was to be in the guise of a Folly, while Paul, seeing the group around the blue page went over to see what was causing the excitement. In a few moments he divined several things—that the lovely Cherubino was a lady "tres comme il faut," that she was sadly out of her element and that she was ready to die with fright.

He resolved to put an end to the situation, so approaching the pretty page, he exclaimed, "Ah! faithless one, I have found you at last. Why did you desert me?" In an undertone he added: "Fear nothing, Madame, I shall protect you. Do me the honor to accept my arm."

Lucie took the proffered arm but was too much frightened to do more than murmur her thanks. Almost at the same moment the Count was seen approaching, a circumstance which, far from reassuring Lucie, only redoubled her misery and terror. The Count had not discovered his Folly, and was somewhat surprised and irritated at the apparition of the blue page. He determined to fathom the matter, and approaching De Neyrac claimed acquaintance with the lady.

The whispered assent of Lucie confirmed the assertion, and husband and wife found themselves walking off, arm in arm. They were silent. The Count was thinking deeply, the Countess endeavoring to control her sobs.

Count de Plessy belonged to an old family of Provence whose pride was only equaled by its poverty. He was easily offended but by no means easily mollified. In his ancestral castle on a dry hillside his stern old mother held almost feudal sway over a number of faithful servants and tenants. He had married Lucie for her money, she being the orphan and heiress of a rich manufacturer. For his wife he had a feeling of toleration approaching contempt.

Meanwhile the trembling page clung to his arm, and at last ventured a timid "Alfred." She then began to sob violently.

The Count on recognizing his wife's voice dreaded a scene and led her toward a box. Once safe she wept, clung to him, and begged forgiveness.

He eyed her from head to foot coldly. "So it was in my honor that you came to this place in this guise?" exclaimed he. "However, I do not believe you. You came to meet Monsieur de Neyrac, on whose arm I found you. I shall send him a challenge tomorrow."

The Count was a farceur and his only intention was to frighten his wife a little more, seeing she was on the verge of being nearly frightened to death. Besides, he thought that if the story of Madame's coming to the ball in this disguise were to get out it would be a great joke in the clubs. There was yet time to save himself. Summoning a servant he directed him to order a fiacre. Then turning to his wife he said:

"You will return home immediately. You say you have lost your companions. Let them take care of themselves. For the present, enough of this."

He coldly and in silence conducted her to the carriage, gave directions to the driver, and returned to the ball. "What have you done with your blue page?" asked Paul de Neyrac.

"Bah! she was stupid. I contrived to lose her."

Lucie saw nothing of her husband the next day nor the next. She did not even leave the house to attend church. Madame X. called and was denied admittance by the servants. On the evening of the third day Alfred entered his wife's dressing room. She was frightened and tearful, dreading she knew not what. Would the Count kill M. de Neyrac? Would he divorce her, put her in a convent? Most of her ideas of life were derived from novels. She flew to meet her husband.

"Be seated, madame," he said, coldly.

She obeyed. "You have been guilty of an impropriety unbefitting your rank. You do not know how to conduct yourself as my wife. On account of your youth I forgive you, but you must leave Paris."

"Leave Paris, Alfred? Where will you send me?"

"I shall place you in charge of my mother. Order your woman to pack your trunks and accompany you. The carriage will convey you to the night train for Lyons. Adieu, madame."

So the poor little Countess was bustled away to her husband's gloomy old castle. That was ten years ago, and she is still there. She has never been permitted to return to Paris. She has grown thin, faded, and devout. The Count enjoys himself after his own fashion, and constantly expresses to society his regret that his wife's health requires her to live in the south, and that she can not stand the climate of Paris.

A MATTER OF INCHES.

The famous serio exclaimed—
Her tears were falling fast—
"The present fame I now enjoy
Will soon be of the past."

"Not so," said friends, "though on the halls,
You have a ringing voice,
And just to see you in a dance
Would make a mute rejoice.

"To match your shapely lissom form
No rival can aspire,
Orchestra, boxes, gallery
Your rounded calves admire."

"'Tis vain," quoth she, "to comfort me,
Though kindly meant, I know:
My kick is inches lower
Than it was a year ago!"

THE CIGAR OF CLUBDOM.

No person in the world is so hard to please with regard to his "smoke" as the man of clubs. Your swell club man is the real connoisseur. He knows that it is not always the cigar with the most high-sounding title, or that sports the gayest band, that is the best brand. He chooses a brand that he knows, an honest cigar that never fails to give enjoyment. This is why, wherever you go, in every club you find the Lord Temple cigar the favorite. It is properly called "the Club Cigar" for all smart clubmen smoke it.

Mr. Younghusband: I am going to be a father in about a month.

Mr. Clubwit: Why, it'll be an Easter baby, won't it?

Mr. Younghusband: Oh, Lord! yes, I never thought of that. I'll have to buy it a bonnet.

THE REASON WHY.

"Why I drink Argonaut O. K.," said a prominent club man in answer to a question as to his choice of a brand, "is because I have found no other whisky to equal it."

THE WIDOW'S MITE.

The "widow's mite," so Scriptures say,
Hath been exalted in the sight
Of God and man; none laugh away
The widow's might.

In Cupid's realm of sweet delight,
'Tis said the widow, too holds sway,
And rules the kingdom, as of right.

This much I know, that, sad or gay,
In sorrow grim or joyaunce bright,
The pulsings of my heart betray
That widow's smite.

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought or other fads. Instruction private, not classes. We solicit investigation.

INSTANTANEOUS WATER HEATER.

If you want a hot bath any moment, day or night, you must have an instantaneous heater. There are hundreds in use, and not a single purchaser can be found who does not praise it highly. Mr. N. Del Banco of 2457 Scott street says: "I gladly and highly recommend your Ribbon Water Heater. It works charmingly, surpassing all my expectations, and is one of the greatest comforts I ever had in the house." See advertisement on page 30.

ART AT VICKERY'S

There is a very interesting exhibition at Vickery's. It opened on Thursday, and already many of the paintings are sold. Some of Mrs. Richardson's choicest gems are among the features of the collection. Mr. Vickery has the art of bringing together and displaying that in which the art-loving soul delights, and this is one of the occasions. A visit to Vickery's in Post street near Stockton, is a treat.

A New System of Playing the Races

One can point to no year in the history of turfdom where such genuine interest in the sport of kings has been manifested as in this, the winter season of 1901-1902. Racing is a sport that appeals to the manly man. It is also a sport that appeals to the business man, if he goes about its enjoyment in the right way. The only way that suggests itself to the level-headed man is to find a system that commends itself for its wisdom, accuracy and integrity.

N. S. Hand, the expert handicapper of 113 Stockton street, recently perfected and copyrighted a new "alternating" system of playing the races that is thoroughly practical and safe as well as highly profitable. It consists in playing the first two choices on handicap figures and shows a profit of over five thousand dollars during the past forty days at the Oakland track, on two thousand dollars and Hand's figures. Mr. Hand is now organizing a pool in this city for the purpose of operating his system and will accept commissions from twenty dollars up, to be played by him on the California and Eastern tracks on a co-operative basis. He charges a commission of twenty-five per cent of the net profits as pay for his services in full. Mr. Hand has had fine experience in turf matters, and is the secretary and chief handicapper for the Metropolitan Horse Owners' Association of New York. He is the author of the original "American Handicapping System" and also of "Hand's System of Handicapping" which are now in general use on all American tracks. They are the standard textbooks of the turf on this side of the big pond.

This Metropolitan Horse Owners' Association, by the way, requires a word by itself. It is incorporated under the laws of the State of New York and has a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars. Its officers are all men whose names are known to every horse owner and turf man. Andrew Mills is managing race editor of the Daily American; Frank Reagan is owner of the famous racing stables that bear his name; Harry M. Mason is expert trainer for J. G. Follansbee's racing stables of New York; P. F. Charles is the New York end of the firm of N. S. Hand & Co. The association was formed for the purpose of buying, controlling and operating thoroughbred race-horses in the standard tracks throughout the country, as a business proposition on a co-operative basis. Only the most competent and experienced trainers, veterinary surgeons, handicappers, jockeys and assistants are employed by the association. No horse of less market value than one thousand dollars is purchased or leased, and their racing condition is closely looked into by experts before the bargain is consummated. The Metropolitan Horse Owners' Association treats racing from the business standpoint, and in this but carries out the example of many of our shrewdest and greatest capitalists who are one after the other turning to the turf for profitable investment of their capital.

Mr. Hand also looks upon racing from the financial point of view, as does the association of which is is secretary. He is a sportsman. He loves racing for itself, but he believes that haphazard betting is not the way to promote interest in the king of sports. There is no reason, he argues, why a man should not place his bets according to the dictates of reason any more than he should buy a house or a lot, or put his capital into commerce without proper investigation and thought. Mr.

N. S. HAND

Hand has been connected with the turf for many years. For nine years he was assistant bank examiner of the Chicago post-office, but when he made thirty-two thousand dollars on the turf in six weeks, he decided to resign from routine work and devote his whole time to racing. He has been steadily successful in the eight years that have passed since then. For seven years he has visited San Francisco annually, and he takes a sincere interest in the progress of racing on this coast.

A curious circumstance, for there seems to be no analogy between music and the turf, is the fact that the noted author of the "American Handicapping System" is also the author and composer of "Come Where the Wild Flowers Bloom," the quartet sung for four years in Denman Thompson's "The Old Homestead"; "Rock the Cradle, Mother," the famous lullaby sung by Haverly's Minstrels and other troupes; "Mother's Old-Fashioned Rocker," which has had a large sale; "Swinging the Baby," which is being sung in New York today; "Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep," and other popular songs. All these pieces are sold by the leading music dealers throughout the country. "Hand's Improved Harmony Chart, a Self-Instructor," of which over eighty thousand copies have been sold, is as well known among musicians as the "System of Handicapping" is among frequenters of race courses. Mr. Hand is exceedingly fond of music and has natural talent in that line. If ever he is able to find the leisure from his multifarious business interests he should try his hand at a comic opera on a turf topic. It would be sure to make a hit. His "Musical Indicator" and "Guitar Harmony" are standard text books in musical schools and conservatories.

This man who is called the most expert handicapper in the United States, and who is also one of America's favorite composers, is not the least of a poseur. He is very modest in manner, but courteous and kind, with a natural sympathy and magnetism that have gained him friends in every city he has visited. He is positively honest and upright in his dealings, scorns a lie or a subterfuge, and few men are held in such universal respect. One of the qualities that has assisted him to the high place he now occupies is his invariable coolness. He is like the successful lion and tiger hunter who, in the presence of danger, retains his nerve. Men of lesser intellect and backbone could not hold the position of adviser to the whole racing world, which is practically the position of Mr. Hand. The latter can do it without flinching for he never loses his head. He is a splendid type of the thoroughbred American.

Mr. Hand will leave here about the fifteenth of April for New York, for the opening of the Eastern season, where he will operate the same as if in San Francisco, placing commissions.

STAGE

"The Serenade" by Local Singers

The management of the Tivoli may rest on its oars for awhile now and devote its waking hours to inventing a handsome souvenir to commemorate "The Serenade's" one hundredth performance. For an emphatic hit, and worthily one, has been made by the present production of the De Koven-Smith opera. To the audiences that delight in comic opera this is the biggest treat the Tivoli has given us in years. The croakers' prognostication that the Bostonians' opera would be nothing without the singers for whom it was written appears to be a fallacy, for not even Jessie Bartlett Davis is missed. The Tivoli singers have carefully followed the Bostonians in business and makeup, and the imitators are in the main better than the originals. "The Serenade" was written for an all-star cast, and if it never had it before it has it now. Hartman, Cashman and Webb form a trio of excellent fun-making quality. Hartman gives a very straight performance of the Duke of Vera Cruz, and Cashman's Gomez is exceedingly droll. But it is Webb who is the most surprisingly diverting of the three. He makes of Colombo far more than did the original Bostonian who created the role. Schuster sings much better than he used and his Romero is good vocally and dramatically. He sings the carbine song with fine expression and is well backed up by the male chorus, which has been admirably drilled. Cunningham is magnificent as the dashing Alvarado and Gordon makes a delightful Lopez. Some melodious numbers fall to both. The former has the stirring postillion song, and the latter the beautiful love song in the last act. Cunningham also has the duet with Dolores when the serenade gets in its first innings. Anna Lichter is a sweet and charming Yvonne and nothing could be more exquisitely sung than her "birdie" solo in the monastery garden. The audience seems never to get enough of this or of the gay waltz song in the same act. I am quite sure that there is no one on the comic opera stage who possesses such a flawless contralto voice as Frances Graham's. She imbues her part of Dolores, both as actress and singer, with a vigor and enthusiasm that are absolutely fascinating. The "Angelus," Piff-Paff and other songs that fall to her are faultlessly rendered. Annie Meyers as the Abbess, Fogarty as the Abbott, Kavanagh as the Ancestor and Guise as a Bandit, all add strength to the cast. The tout ensemble of "The Serenade" is such as to give its stage and orchestral directors good cause for congratulation. In this self-applause Ferris Hartman can truthfully take to himself a fat share. His "Dreaming" is one of the emphatic hits of the production.

Apropos of "The Corner Grocery"

If Georgie Cooper ever wishes to take to the vaudeville stage she is sure to obtain vogue as an imitator. She took off Fougere, in a few characteristics of that fascinating Parisian, on the opening night of "The Corner Grocery" when as an encore to "Shet that Golden Gate" she sang "I'd Leave My Happy Home for You." I wonder if anybody has ever noticed the striking resemblance Georgie Cooper bears to Louise Thorndyke Boucicault? I look for fine work in the future from this young girl, and her present training in the Belasco-Thall stock company is just what will fit her for future triumphs. The Central stock is one of the best of its kind, and the versatility of all the members of the company is remarkable. James W. Horne, who is the theatre's assistant treasurer, strengthens the cast of "The Corner Grocery" by appearing as the mischievous lad. His eccentric song and dance are clever and original.

George Primrose no minstrel team was more popular than theirs. Emerson's name is associated with all that was best in minstrelsy in San Francisco, and any number of stories have been revived about him since his death. His palmiest days were perhaps those when he and Charlie Reed were partners. Reed passed away long ago. Queen is probably best known out here as the author of "Dem Goo Goo Eyes."

Attractions Next Week

"The Serenade" will run all next week at the Tivoli, and probably for many weeks to come.

"At the White Horse Tavern," which will be the Alcazar's next offering, made a great hit when produced by the Frawleys and is sure to be a success presented by the Alcazar stock. It is comedy drama of direct heart interest, its scenes are exciting and its dialogue moving. It gives scope for some striking stage pictures.

"The Last Stroke," a melodrama with Cuba as the background, will be given at the Central next week.

At the Grand Opera House the revival of Hoyt's plays with George Ober as the star is attracting audiences that nightly test the capacity of that commodious theatre. For the third week of Mr. Ober's engagement Hoyt's clever satire, "A Contented Woman" will be the bill. This comedy is a merry concoction, crowded with deliciously characteristic Hoytian humor. It will be remembered that the role of the heroine was the favorite one of beautiful Caroline Miskel Hoyt. The part of Maverick Brander was created by Tim Murphy, and Mr. Ober has much of the natural humor that made Mr. Murphy's conception so popular. "A Midnight Bell" will have but four more performances.

"Arizona" has been a success all along the line and Augustus Thomas' latest play is certain of drawing large houses during its Columbia engagement which begins next Monday night. There is a Western flavor to the play that should make it eminently attractive to San Franciscans. It is a story of the lives and loves of men and women living in that picturesque section of our national domain which is now knocking at the doors of Congress with the demand for the dignities of statehood. The company includes Grace Elliston, Dustin Farnum, Grace Thorne, Harrison Armstrong, Frazer Coulter, Alma Bradley, Frank Campeau, Ada Craven, Dodson Mitchell, Jane Bliss Taylor, Ben Deane, William Hazeltine, Stanley Murphy and Clement R. Kirby.

The ten Nelsons will reappear at the Orpheum tomorrow after a year's absence from the city. During this timet hey have appeared in the principal vaudeville centres of the world and they return with an acrobatic act even more daring and sensational than their last. The Auers, quaint comedians from Europe, who make pictures out of rags and do other unique things, will make their first appearance in San Francisco. Eva Mudge, known as the "American Girl Who Captivated London," will also be new here. She is a petite and pretty lighting change artist and singer who appears in military and other costumes. The Leamer sisters, equilibrists, promise an extraordinary exhibition. The three Meers will vary their wire walking performance, Billy Clifford will sing new songs and spring new gags, the Probyn Ladies' Quartet promises an entire change of program, J. C. Nugent and Grace Fertig will continue their laughing gem, "The Absent Minded Beggar," and the Biograph will show new pictures.

MUSIC

A Child Violinist

Next Tuesday, March fourth, is the date set for the outcoming concert of young Aileen McCabe the fourteen-year-old violinist who according to her teacher, Noah Brandt, is at the beginning of a notable career. The child's education has been a matter of but two years on the violin, her previous life having been spent at Madera near Fresno, where her mother, a teacher of the piano, discovered by pure accident that the child had extraordinary talent. At five years she began to teach her the piano, after being astonished at the infallibility displayed in her knowledge of correct pitch by the sound alone. While studying the piano the little one would improvise dainty melodies of her own conception almost invariably in a sad trend of thought that made her mother, who watched her closely, melancholy to listen to. After a year of piano study she evinced so strong a desire to learn the violin that the piano lessons were discontinued and every effort made to find a way to get to the city where she could study the instrument she loved. Three years ago they left their old home and upon a venture came to San Francisco. Here Mrs. McCabe managed to get pupils and six months later sought Noah Brandt who undertook the education of the young musician. Allowing for six months of absence from the city the child has had but two years' training on the violin, with the most gratifying results. She plays Wieniawski, De Beriot, Vieuxtemps and composers of the higher class of writers for the violin, with an intonation, strength and maturity that are astonishing. Only with the artist born could such a result be obtained in so short a period of study. Her ear is so acute that she can sing instantly any note the moment it is called for and names the notes of chords rapidly and without hesitation as soon as they are struck on the piano. She is a prepossessing child, modest and unassuming, devoted to her art and working like the true devotee for the career she has been assured is ahead of her. After Tuesday night's concert in which she will be assisted by eminent local talent, there will be a tour, but for this arrangements have not yet been completed.

Nordica's Good-bye

A packed house greeted Nordica at her farewell concert. Aisle seats were at a premium and people were well content to stand in every available place for the supreme privilege of hearing this great singer once more. It was a triumph and I think Nordica felt it herself for she never sang better and the encores shook the house, even women calling out in the self-forgetfulness of their delight in her art. The song cycle of Von Fielitz was the principal work of the program, the remainder being somewhat altered and substitutions made. It was this that gave us again "Brunhilde's Call," which she made her farewell, and a fitting one it was, since with that character she will ever be identified in our minds as the highest, noblest type of womanhood. All in all, I think her second program was the most satisfactory all through and preserved more unity, and it was in this second concert that Nordica seemed to shine in a different light and displayed more of real every-day tenderness in her tones.

Sir Henry Entertains Hofmann

It transpires that the dinner given in the red room of the Bohemian club on February thirteenth with Josef Hofmann as guest was given by Sir Henry Heyman and is deserving of more than passing comment for the elegance of its appointments. The guests were received in the owl room by the genial host and thence proceeded to the red room where dinner was served, but it was here that a lavish hand was displayed as the decorations were such as to surprise an exclamation of pleasure from the lips of the guest of honor. Over the round table and suspended from the ceiling was an immense Chinese umbrella sixteen feet in diameter and of gorgeous hues, from each corner of which hung a lighted Chinese lantern and from the centre an Oriental lamp of beautiful design, also lighted. The centrepiece of the table was a magnificent antique copper vase filled with branches of rare plum blossoms while the table itself was almost entirely concealed with the wealth of rare orchids, violets and ferns. Candelabra with rose colored shades cast a pleasant glow over the surroundings and the favors were boutonnieres—gorgeous carnations of enormous size. The menu was printed in gold letters upon heavy white cardboard, with the club crest embossed in gold in one corner. Josef Hofmann was greatly surprised and expressed his pleasure in unstinted terms. Sir Henry acted as toastmaster and paid his guest the most graceful and sincere compliments, to his art and to himself as a man, speaking of him as "An artist of God's own creating and a distinguished and refined gentleman as well." Good stories and much flashing of wit abounded and the guests one and all declared it an evening which they will long remember. Those present were: Josef and Casimir Hofmann, Mayor Schmitz, Park Commissioner Altman, F. P. Deering, president of the Bohemian club, Horace G. Platt and Vanderlynn Stow, both ex-presidents of the club, Louis Sloss Jr., Judge M. C. Sloss, Charles Dickman, I. G. Waterman and Sir Henry Heyman.

Emma Nevada

The most notable figure of the present concert season is Madame Emma Nevada, who is to appear in concert at Metropolitan hall next Monday night, assisted by three European artists of distinction. Nevada has just returned to her native land after a couple of years spent abroad, during one of which she was the prima donna at The Hague, where she sang by royal command at the wedding of young Queen Wilhelmina and during the season sang in opera at the Royal Opera House. It is said that the diva's voice is in perfect condition and she will be heard to every possible advantage at the coming concert. Her trills and her cadenzas are so perfect that criticism fails. Her velvety voice is like a flake of silken, impalpable fioss, wafted through the auditorium and resolved in tenderest melody in the consciousness of her enraptured hearers. It is said that her performance as well as that part of the concert contributed by her talented company is a musical event that no lover of the divine art can well afford to miss. The songstress brings with her the great violoncellist from Spain, Pablo Casals, an artist accorded great praise by all the European critics; Leon Moreau, the pianist, and Daniel Maquarre, a flutist of great distinction in France. The advance sale of seats for the concert now in progress at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s music store shows a big demand. Seats are one dollar, two dollars, and three dollars.

Katharine Fisk

For the first time in many years we will have the pleasure of listening to a great contralto in song recitals. Mrs. Katherine Fisk, the famous American concert and oratorio singer, who possesses that rare gift, a true contralto voice, will give four recitals at Sherman, Clay & Co. hall on the nights of Tuesday and Friday, March eleventh and fourteenth and afternoons of Thursday and Saturday, March thirteenth and fifteenth, under the management of Bouvier and Greenbaum. Mrs. Fisk has appeared with great success with the London Philharmonic, Richter's, Colonne's, Boston Symphony and other great orchestras and with all the leading oratorio societies of England and America. Her pre-eminence lies in that rare combination of a voice of wonderful depth, range and dramatic quality, an intense artistic temperament, broad musical intelligence, beauty of face and physique, and a most charming and winning personality. Mrs. Fisk is a prominent figure in Chicago society, in which city her husband is Superintendent of Schools. Aside from her well-nigh endless repertoire of oratorio and aria, Mrs. Fisk has made extremely popular her delightful ballad recitals in German, French, English, Italian and Scotch. The programs for her recitals in this city are particularly interesting and can be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where the sale of seats opens next Thursday morning. Prices are seventy-five cents, one dollar and one dollar and a half.

Next Friday afternoon the last concert of the second series given by the San Francisco Symphony Society, will take place at the Grand Opera House. Director Paul Steindorff and his fifty-five men have prepared an unusually strong program, which is as follows: Symphony, No. 3 (Eroica L. von Beethoven;

The Chicago Symphony Concert

One of the greatest treats I have listened to in many a day was the opening concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. "Tannhauser" was finely done, the fifty individuals playing as one man. In the "Scotch" symphony one began to see what metal these men were made of and became aware that Mr. Rosenbecker's baton, though so quietly wielded, was much alive and that every phrase in the orchestra was made by that insignificant-looking piece of wood. The orchestra wrought out the whole wonderful picture, and its finish was greeted with a rousing encore. The overture "1812," of Tchaikowsky, was also a fine piece of work, the composition bearng the unmistakable impress of Polish enthusiasm. Jan von Oordt did some splendid violin work in Wieniawski's Concerto in D minor, No. 2. He possesses a technique and temperament that make his playing a delight. Mr. Towne impressed me at first as having a great deal of voice, but a little every-day encore song displayed the quality of his voice in softer tones. Madame Linne has some fine top notes, but her voice in the altogether is not so pleasng. The orchestra played again last night, and there will be concerts this afternoon and evening.

The concert of Belle Clair Chamberlain on the evening of February twenty-first was artistically a success though the severity of the weather kept many away who, living at a distance, could not brave the elements. However, Miss Chamberlain played like the artist she is as if to a full house and won many encores for the manner in which she rendered the fine program she had prepared. Her finest number I think was the last, the "Twelfth Rhapsodie" of Liszt, which was a splendid rendering of a difficult composition. In encore she gave a "Nocturne" by Tchaikowsky with beautifully delicate and poetical meaning. Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeler des Ganges" was one of her most poetical numbers and she gave the "Magic Fire Scene" of Wagner's "Walkeure" with splendid conception. Miss Chamberlain is so plainly endowed with unusual talents as a pianiste one can but wish that she might fulfill the prediction of Carreno, and become a piano virtuoso of worldwide reputation.

Despite the tempestuous weather on Thursday, the evening set for the recital given by the piano pupils of the Von Meyerinck School of Music, there was a fine attendance and the program went off in the most successful and gratifying fashion Miss Jessie Burns, Mr. Ed. Rosenlund and Miss Johnston carried off the honors of the piano department and Master Alenberg won much commendation for his rendering of the Bach-Gounod prelude. He is a very young violin student. The Ladies' Quartet did fine work, the Damrosch number "Violets" being applauded until a repetition was given. Those who took part in the program were the Misses Cronan, Johnston and Burns, piano pupils; Master Ferdinand Alenberg, violin; Mr. Ed. Rosenlund, piano and the Misses Gross, Craig, Burns and Davidson of the Ladies' Quartet.

A concert is anounced for Monday evening, March tenth, at Sherman-Clay hall in which the participants will be Madame Abbie Carrington, vocalist, Miss Mary Carrington and Emlyn Lewys, pianists. It is a strong combination and as the forenamed artists have given us a taste of what they are able to do musically, there should be a full house. The program is sure to be attractive and its rendition most enjoyable.

"Emma Nevada will wear some stunning Worth gowns at her coming concert at Metropolitan hall next Monday night." Thus reads the press agent's copy. This is somewhat unusual—can it be that Madame Nevada will change her attire between songs? —The Music Critic

THE WINE FOR PRINZ HENRY

According to a telegram received by the San Francisco Associated Press, at the President's banquet, on the 24th inst at the White House, Washington, to Prinz Henry of Prussia, the only champagne served was Moet & Chandon's White Seal and Brut Imperial. At the launching of the German Emperor's yacht Meteor the boat was christened with a bottle of White Seal.

A dramatic presentation of Zola's "La Terre" has aroused the indignation of the people of the village of Cloyes, who protest against being misrepresented. Many of the characters were drawn from well-known inhabitants, and incidents slightly modified have been made use of. Now the people protest, not against these things in themselves, but against the impression that they are types and characteristic of the community. The costumes, by the way, were purchased from the villagers, so that in the matter of dress, at least, the production should be realistic.

George Osbourne's portrayal of Thomas Holden, the part written for Crane, is something that will linger in the memory long after "The Head of the Family" the play, is forgotten. Osbourne has done much good work in his time, but nothing to equal his Thomas Holden at the Alcazar this week.

LETTERS

The Prefatory Puff

In the course of a review of a recent English publication, "The Case of the Factory Acts," the Saturday Review (London), takes occasion to make some scathing remarks on the subject of prefaces. This book, the result of the observation of a number of people who have investigated the subject and might reasonably be expected to know what they are writing about, is introduced by a preface written by Mrs. Henry Ward, who confesses that she herself knows nothing about the subject and is not specially interested. The only value her preliminary chapter can have is to attract attention by her name, and the natural supposition is that she, and others who figure in like positions, must be well paid for their endorsement. One is always doubtful of books that are praised in advance of publication, and when we are told that "those who have been privileged to read the manuscript pronounce it a masterpiece," the natural inclination is to ask who "those" may be and why we should take their word for it. It was Queen Victoria's notice of "Between Two Worlds" that brought Marie Corelli into undue prominence, and because Gladstone liked "Ships that Pass in the Night" Beatrice Harraden found herself famous. Gladstone prefaced "Ecce Homo," also, and the book sold because of its preface. That was in our grandfathers' time, but Gladstone continued the practice of encouraging authors up to our own period. Publishers have made it a practice, for many years, to furnish advance notices and brief descriptions of the contents of the books they send out for review, but quite recently the custom seems to have been abandoned. The notices, as is only to be expected, were always most favorable, and the conscienceless critic was given to reproducing them in their entirety, and saving himself the trouble of reading the books for which, in many cases, he was to be commended for his wisdom. The custom of "editing" and "prefacing," and otherwise creeping in between the covers of books has grown to be an imposition. One would often rather know who is the printer, or the binder who turns out a fine volume than what some one else wishes us to think in advance. Literary people are by no means infallible judges of superiority. Indeed, they have been accused too often of constituting a mutual admiration association for the lay reader to be altogether unskeptical of their disinterestedness. Mr. Howells is always discovering some new star of the first magnitude, and Mr. Bailey Millard used to discover a new poet every week, for a while, but neither hoi polloi nor the select few can be coaxed or coerced into accepting them as permanent additions to the ranks. The Saturday Review advises readers to "Let alone books with a preliminary puff," which bit of wisdom it will be safe to heed in the majority of cases at least. A book must stand or fall by its own merits. It is not to be administered, like medicine.

Pirated Ships

Beatrice Harraden's complaint of the small price she received for her one really good book, by the way, has become tiresome through reiteration. She was utterly unknown to the world of readers, and she was practically in the position of a small boy who puts to sea on a raft. He stands a very good chance of drowning, and if he goes down it is neither the raft nor the sea that should be blamed. Miss Harraden sold the copyright of her book outright, and the Putnams paid the English publisher for permission to issue an American edition. They were not bound to do anything more, and the further sum which they paid the author was a voluntary gift on their part. It was the fault of the English publishers that the book was not copyrighted in this country, and that the way was thus left open for piracy. Miss Harraden would have made more if she had reserved her copyright and taken a royalty on sales, but there is no predicting in advance what kind of a book will take the public fancy. Better novels than "Ships" have failed to keep afloat on the sea of literature, and it easily might have happened that a royalty would not have paid the cost of publication. Miss Harraden has done nothing since which has made any stir in the world of letters, and instead of so much complaint of hard usage it might be as well to regard the matter from a common sense standpoint. The success of "Ships" made a first-class advertisement for her later attempts, and if she thinks she was defrauded by the agreement which she voluntarily entered into then, she should console herself by the reflection that it helped her to find publishers and prices later on. It is just these unexpected successes of new writers which encourage publishers to keep in business. They cannot be expected to be always on the small end.

When Gertrude Franklin Atherton began her work on Alexander Hamilton she intended to write a "flexible biography," whatever that may be. She made a trip to the West Indies in search of material and is reported to have unearthed a quantity of original matter. The "flexible biography," however, is to be a novel, with the title "The Conqueror." This completed it is in order to ask what has become of the project set forth some time ago of dramatizing some of Mrs. Atherton's novels.

Will Kipling Dramatize?

A dramatization of "The Story of the Gadsbys," authorized by Kipling, has just been completed and there is considerable talk of putting "Kim" on the stage. How that is to be managed, without the shade of a shadow of a love story in the ordinary sense, is yet to be explained, but probably it is considered sufficient for dramatic purposes that "Kim" is one of the books of the day, and the name Kipling is depended on to draw. Kipling certainly gives people something to talk about, and if there is no special production to draw the fire, it is always safe for any one who craves notoriety to shoot in his direction. Just a present it is his last poem, "The Islanders," which is the target for abuse. Any student of his earlier work must be struck with the fact that until the Boer-British war, Kipling himself was as confident as any one, that the sight of a few British soldiers was all that was needed to strike consternation into the hearts of any foe. The difference is that he has learned by experience, where others are still wrapped in their smug complacency. It is a commentary of which each may make his own application, that when one of the telegraph companies made a nominal rate for wounded officers, with the idea that they would avail themselves of the concession to communicate with their families in regard to their condition, in almost every instance the message sent out was an inquiry about the odds on the Derby.

The London Academy has published the replies to its yearly query addressed to well-known people as to what two of the books of the past twelve months they have considered the best. The surprising thing which is revealed is the amount of trash which these well-known people must consume, for in most instances their best is the best of a very bad lot. Only Frank T. Bullen has had the courage to say so, however, and he frankly admits that Kipling's "Kim" was the only one which possessed attractions for him. The rest were so poor that he fell back on the writers of an older day. One must make due allowance for temperament, and admit that all good books are not equally attractive to all good readers. Mr. Bullen might have found many readable volumes amongst the late publications but having tried to regale himself upon ashes and found the meal unpalatable, he cannot be blamed if he ceased to burrow through the whole pile in the hope of a stray morsel, and turned his steps in the direction where he knew from experience that a full meal was to be found.

The following is quoted from the New York Sun of January eleventh: "The reader may make up his mind to be pleasantly overwhelmed by the opulence and vivacity of 'Around the Pan,' published by the Nutshell Publishing Company, 1059 Third avenue, New York. The wonders begin with the frontispiece picture of President McKinley, drawn in a single line beginning at a point on the cheek bone and going round and round in a constantly widening circle, with waverings and downbearings of the pen in the proper places to secure detachment and shading. We are told that this portrait 'is considered the most unique work of its kind in the world,' and if there are degrees of uniqueness we are willing to believe that this is most the thing of which there are no duplicates. Of course there is text in addition to the pictures, and we should be surprised indeed to hear from any purchaser the opinion that he had not got his money's worth ($2.00)." —The Bookworm

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff,
vs.
William Henry Weston, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

The Virtuous Proof Reader

A Confirmed Old Bachelor had been employed for Fifteen Years as Proof Reader in a Publishing House. In that time he had Read many Million galleys of novels and poetry, and had Met many Young and Pretty Copy Holders and Compositors without having had his Heart stirred the sixteenth part of an Em.

One day the Publishing House where the Confirmed Old Bachelor worked assumed charge of a Twentieth Century Magazine. Its fiction was of the kind that Burns Big Holes and its poetry of the kind that makes Mephistopheles grin belowstairs. When the Proof Reader started in on the First Batch of material he had to stop every

RIPANS

The simplest remedy for indigestion, constipation, biliousness and the many ailments arising from a disordered stomach, liver or bowels is Ripans Tabules. They have accomplished wonders, and their timely aid removes the necessity of calling a physician for the many little ills that beset mankind. They go straight to the seat of the trouble, relieve the distress, cleanse and cure the affected parts, and give the system a general toning up.

Ten Minutes to call for a Drink of Ice-Water, th. Heat from the manuscripts was so Intense. Suddenly he said to the Copy Holder, "I shall resign my Job. It goes against my Conscience to read such Immoral Rot, to assist in Disseminating such Vice."

"I think," said the Copy Holder after a particularly Warm Chapter of a Succulent Storiette had been corrected and been sent in to be Revised, "that it must be Real Nice to be loved that way."

Her words sank into the Confirmed Old Bachelor's heart and when he went Home he Thought Them Over. The next day, between proof marks he Stole a Glance at the Copy Holder. He noted the Blush that rose when anything in the Manuscript disturbed her Equanimity. And he began to think that there might be something in this Impetuous, Scalding, High-seasoned, Fervid Passion that must surely be Exhilarating. And one day the proof Reader sampled a Dizzy Dinner in a Sky-high French Restaurant in company with the Pretty Copy Holder.

OUR OPINION

Los Angeles versus California

The Call suggests that one of the pressing needs of the time is that of providing for a suitable exhibition of the resources and industries of Califorina at the St. Louis exposition. The same paper declares that San Francisco should contribute liberally for the whole State because Los Angeles the metropolis of the South will give her aid exclusively to that section. Los Angeles has not only been giving her aid to the South for many years, but she has also been engaged in knocking all other sections of the State. The carpet-baggers of Los Angeles, who have a few town lots, an oil well, or an orange grove to sell, have not been content with booming the glorious climate of the lower citrus belt. They have devoted themselves assiduously to the task of libeling San Francisco, and distorting the facts concerning other parts of the State. There is comparatively little State pride in Los Angeles. Those people who have favored a division of California have done this section of the State a great deal of harm by their misrepresentations. There are people who go to Los Angeles every winter who almost faint at the suggestion of a visit to San Francisco. They are told that this city is blanketed in fog fully three hundred days in the year, and that it is sure death to people whose lungs are not copper-lined. Yarns of an equally slanderous character are poured into the ears of the Eastern tourist regarding all other sections of the State north of Tehachapi. It is interesting to note the surprise of Eastern people when told the truth about the climate of San Francisco: that the heat is never unendurable in this city as it is in Los Angeles, or that we never suffer from extreme cold. They are sceptical when told that there is a citrus belt in the north that far excels that of Los Angeles, and that there is no valley south of Tehachapi more bountiful in its products than those of Sacramento, San Joaquin, Santa Clara and Monterey. It behooves the people of California north of Tehachapi not only to make a suitable exhibition of the resources and industries of the State, but also to put into circulation literature calculated to enlighten the country on the subject of the climate, the health resorts and the scenery of the northern section of the State. The mineral springs of the north are unknown beyond the State border, the forests of Humboldt have never been heard of east of Nevada, and not one person in a million east of Ogden knows that the climate of Marin county is to be had in a half-hour's journey from San Francisco. But the comparatively meagre charms of Los Angeles have been touted all over the United States, and the name of that county is gradually being substituted for that of the State. But the fame of Los Angeles has not been achieved by disparaging all other counties. The people have spent their money in advertising. At the Chicago Exposition they made a showing that overshadowed that of all the the rest of the State and they have been reaping the benefit of their enterprise.

The Election of Senators

The proposed amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by the people, which was passed two weeks ago by the House of Representatives, is once more the subject of widespread discussion. The opponents of the measure are greatly excited over the action of the House of Representatives, and are striving to create the impression that sound and conservative public opinion is against radically changing one of the most fundamental provisions of our Constitution. Of course the millionaires of the Senate are opposed to the amendment because its effect may be to relegate them to private life. Having attained the toga under the present system they are well satisfied with it, and are not anxious to fly to one whose advantages they know not of. The opponents of the amendment truthfully assert that to make the Senate an effective and representative upper chamber the framers of the Constitution provided for the election of the senators as representatives of the States in the National Government, and thus distinguished them from the members of the House who represent not the State but its population. And they vaguely hint that if the amendment goes through it will wreck the whole system of the distribution of the powers of government between the people as a whole and the States which form the Union. There does not appear to be occasion for misgivings on that subject. The only provision of the Constitution which cannot be changed without the consent of every State is that providing for the equality of State representation in the Senate. The character of the Senate may be changed as proposed, without affecting State representation. The strongest point urged against the amendment is that it involves the substitution of an irresponsible nominating convention for the Legislature which is a constitutional body composed of men acting under oath with a large responsibility. Senator Hoar urged that point in a speech two years ago. But a nominating convention does not elect. If an unfit man be nominated for the Senate by a nominating convention he shall not be sure of election. Under the system proposed he will have to make his fight before the people. Besides experience has shown that under the present system Legislatures elected in the interest of senatorial candidates and with the aid of money supplied by such candidates are not of a higher moral character than the nominating conventions selected by political machines. And aspirants for the toga are not so likely to purchase a nomination with the prospect of their appealing to the fickle public as they are to buy the job from those who have the power to "deliver the goods." And even though the change were not to improve the character of the Senate, it would at least have a tendency to insure the States a better quality of legislation. The expectation of a senatorial sack is the cause of more than half the corruption in State Legislatures.

Let Them Write

The Munn Avenue Presbyterian church of East Orange, New Jersey, has raised a discussion of the question whether or not a minister should write books. Their pastor, Rev. James M. Ludlow, recently published a novel on a Biblical theme, and some of the congregation object on the ground that a pastor's time belongs to his ministerial duties and that he has no right to go outside of them. Opinion is naturally divided, and the enterprising church journals which have sent out letters of inquiry amongst ministers of the gospel cannot complain of lack of variety in their replies. On the face of it, the natural answer would seem to come in the Yankee form of a counter query : Why not, if he can write good ones? "Books" in this case must be restricted to the sense of novels, and really good novels are by no means so plentiful that there is need to cut off the supply, but the trouble with the ministerial output is that it so seldom is good. There are notable exceptions, among whom are C. W. Gordon (Ralph Connor), Dr. Henry Van Dyke, whom we could ill spare, Charles Frederick Goss and Dr. William Barry. Cyrus Townsend Brady, having tickled the popular fancy, wisely avoided discussion by leaving his church and sticking to the job which promised him the best pay. It was a shrewd bit of advertising that led Robert Bonner to pay Henry Ward Beecher an enormous sum for a novel for the New York Ledger. It was about as poor a novel as ever was written, but the name of Beecher carried the Ledger into many houses. Rev. Charles Sheldon of Kansas City has written a number of novels showing how, in his opinion, the millennium may be hastened. Several of them had an immense vogue in England, where they were brought out in cheap form, though they excited no special interest in this country. Edward Everett Hale is a noted figure in our literary life, and had he never written another line his "Man Without a Country" would have established his fame. If an ordained minister can write a good book, there does not seem to be any reason why he should not do so in his spare time. It would not distract his attention from parish affairs to any greater extent than conducting the sewing circle or the foot ball game. There are divines of every persuasion that might well employ their spare time by dabbling in literature. His Satanic majesty finds work for idle hands even though they belong to a clergyman.

Precedent for Brawls

By looking over the early records of the United States Senate, one is easily convinced that the Tillman-McLaurin row should not be taken as an indication of a deterioration of manners in the nation's highest legislative body. The Senate chamber has been the scene of many brawls. Tillman's swashbuckling plantation manners are perhaps coarser than those of any man that ever wore the toga, and his methods of argument are no doubt without precedent in the Senate, but the peace and dignity of that body have been disturbed before by more serious altercations than that which came near to winding up the political career of the statesmen from South Carolina. Fifty-six years ago Preston S. Brooks of South Carolina assaulted Charles Sumner with a cane in the Senate chamber, and inflicted blows which hastened the death of the Massachusetts statesman. Senator James S. Foote of Mississippi, a member of the Foote family that produced "Our Billy," drew a revolver in the Senate sixty years ago in an attempt to shoot Thomas H. Benton of Missouri. Benton faced his foe and exclaimed: "I have no pistol. I am unarmed. Let the assassin shoot." Other senators seized Foote and disarmed him. Mr. Foote was of the Tillmanic variety of statesmen. In a discussion with Senator Hale of New Hampshire one day he said:

"I invite him to visit Mississippi; and I will tell him beforehand, in all honesty, that he could not go ten miles into the interior before he would grace one of the tallest trees of the forest, with a rope around his neck, with the approbation of every honest and patriotic citizen; and that, if necessary, I should myself assist in the operation."

In the Twenty-second Congress, in a debate on General Jackson's veto of the bill re-chartering the Bank of the United States, Mr. Benton accused Henry Clay of using indecorous language. Mr. Clay said in reply:

"Mr Clay—There are some peculiar reasons why I should not go to that Senator for my views of decorum, in regard to my bearing toward the Chief Magistrate, and why he is not a fit instructor. I never had any personal encounter with the President of the United States. [Benton had been involved in a street fight with General Jackson in Nashville in 1813.] I never complained of any outrages on my person committed by him. [Jackson had struck Benton with a horsewhip.] I never published any bulletins respecting my apprehension and belief that if he were elected we should be obliged to legislate with pistols and dirks by our side.

"Mr. Benton—It is true, sir, that I had an affray with General Jackson, and that I did complain of his conduct. We fought, sir, and we fought, I hope, like men. When the explosion was over there remained no ill will on either side. * * * There is no 'adjourned question of veracity' between me and General Jackson. If there had been, a gulf would have separated us, as deep as hell.

"Mr. Clay—General Jackson made a certain charge [of bargain] against me, and he referred to witnesses to prove it. I denied the truth of the charge. He called upon his witness to prove it. I leave to the country whether that witness sustained the truth of the President's allegation. The witness [Mr. Buchanan] is now on his passage to St. Petersburg, with a commission in his pocket. [Mr. Clay reverted to the dirk-and-pistol remark attributed to Mr. Benton.] Can you look me in the face and say you never used that language?

"Mr. Benton—I look, sir, and repeat that it is an atrocious calumny; and I will pin it to him who repeats it here.

"Mr. Clay—Then I declare before the Senate that you said to me the very words.

"Mr. Benton—False! False! False!

Mr. Clay—I fling back the charge of atrocious calumny upon the Senator from Missouri."

Surely there is abundance of precedent for the use of vituperation and insulting language in what we have been pleased to term the most dignified and courteous legislative body in the world.

The Saunterer

The Result of Meddling

According to Verdenal the announcement of the divorce between the newly married William Northrop Cowles and Marie Zane, following close upon the marital troubles of the De la Montagnes caused great surprise and comment in the Califorina colony in New York. As I happen to know that the whole Californian colony was chattering a few weeks ago over the circumstances of the rush marriage which was said to have been precipitated by Mrs. Major Darling, I doubt whether the news of the divorce excited any surprise. The unfortunate sequel was just what might have been expected. Poor Marie Zane! How unfortunate for her that meddling relatives undertook to mend matters in the old-fashioned way! She was enjoying herself in her little flat, and she was looked upon as an independent bachelor girl. Now she is said to be involved in a divorce suit, and unpleasant gossip is sure to follow.

Our Amusing Snobs

In New York they say that when one of the old families visits San Francisco and mingles with our grass-root aristocracy, his first impression is that our swells are trying to live up to false ideals; that they have absurd notions as to what a real swell should be, and that they make themselves ridiculous by affecting a swagger, the artificiality of which is as striking as the gilding of their counterfeit hall-mark. They tell amusing stories in the New York clubs about some of our provincial swells who are so intent upon being exclusive for fashion's sake that they isolate themselves through fear of losing caste by exposing their acquaintanceship with an ordinary mortal.

Ashton Potter's Threat

One of the stories that has reached New York is about an incident of the Phelan dinner given in honor of the Walter Martins. The story is that Ashton Potter, who attended the dinner, almost had a mix-up with a young man who is vaguely described as one of the Taylor boys who married one of the Hopkins' sisters. If there is anybody in this country who may truthfully boast of aristocratic lineage it is Ashton Potter, and I understand that he strongly detests everything that savors of snobbery. The story is that he received a rather curt reply to a question addressed to the son of a foundryman, and that his indignation was such that he threatened to do a little head punching.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

McAllister and the Millionaires

Wardie McAllister, according to reports received from New York, has had several set-tos with the snobs of San Francisco. As the son of his father, Wardie is entitled to rank with the bluest blooded, and it pains him to observe the antics of our newly rich. He actually sneers at the millionaires of the Pacific Union club, to their faces. They misunderstand him, and think him a snob because of his high appraisement of his blue-blood, and he regards them as snobs because they think that their money entitles them to pose as aristocrats. So there is a yawning gulf between them. The situation is one that appeals to the risibles of the man who has neither blood nor millions, but who has the wit to appreciate the grotesqueness of men that take themselves so seriously.

A Strange Accusation

A Paris newspaper accuses us of being snobs because of the cordial manner in which we received Prince Henry. I wonder what the editor thought of his own people on the occasion of the Czar's visit to Paris a few months ago. The Frenchmen howled with delight and the women kissed every Russian sailor they could get at. We have not acted as snobs, but there has been a suggestion of caddishness in our behavior, for though Prince Henry has been our guest we have been questioning the sincerity of his avowed friendship. Our conduct toward Prince Henry has not been polite. We made a big fuss over him and have shown him the sights, but while affecting a most hospitable nature we have never quit guessing whether he visited us because he liked us or just because he thought he needed our friendship.

THE WORLD OVER

Stern Reality

I am reliably informed that the announcement of Colonel E. F. Preston's candidacy for the gubernatorial job is no joke. Colonel Preston has the virtue of persistency. He has received the undivided vote of San Mateo county for Governor in at least four State conventions, and he is still in the fight. But he has no more chance of getting the nomination than Sam Shortridge has of becoming United States Senator, and yet, like Sam, he has been feeding people with hot air for so many years that he has begun to like it himself. Such men as Shortridge and Preston are an interesting study. They are lawyers and they have made money in the practice of their profession. They have had experience of a character which warrants the presumption that they are "next" in the broadest sense of the word. Yet, in all matters affecting their political ambition, they are as unsophisticated as a child.

An Auto Joke

Those not familiar with the ways of automobiles often find something very amusing in the sight of a steam vehicle drawn up alongside of a watering trough outside some country roadhouse, disputing position with the thirsty horses. As a matter of fact, the steam autos are thirstier than any equine, and must have their bellyful of water every now and then. The gasoline machine can get no relief in this way, and when not on its best behavior, leaves its passengers stranded near the Cliff House, or elsewhere, far from home. Both water and gasoline now and again escape through loopholes unknown to the machine conductors. So the latest chaff among the chauffeurs is as follows:

"Have you heard the newest about Charlie Fair and his automobile?"

"No, what is it?"

"It hasn't leaked out yet."

A Hero Priest

Since the return of the Twenty-second Infantry from the Philippines, an athletic young priest in a military overcoat has been a conspicuous figure at the Presidio and has at times attracted attention on the streets. The young priest is Father Fitzgerald, one of the heroes of El Caney. He was on the firing line throughout that hot engagement, ministering to the wounded and the dying. His conduct under fire aroused the admiration of all that witnessed his calm and intrepid behavior. At the close of the war he was appointed a post chaplain, but when the Twenty-second regiment was ordered to the Philippines he was petitioned by all the men in the command to accompany them, and he did so. While in the Philippines he went everywhere that duty called without escort and he rendered valuable assistance to our troops.

De Youngs in St. Petersburg

From a despatch in the Paris edition of the Herald, I learn that the M. H. de Youngs and Helen de Young were members of a box party at the Imperial Opera House in St. Petersburg, given by Ambassador Tower, a few weeks ago. According to the despatch everybody admired the beautiful costumes of the American women in the box. The following evening they attend a diplomatic reception given by the Ambassador. There were in attendance the British, French, Austrian and Spanish Ambassadors, and the Princes of Siam, with their suite.

Prince David's Bed

The bride of Prince David Kawananakoa is to lie in a bed in her husband's palace by the sea at Honolulu which will be one of the costliest and most magnificent couches in the world. Prince David has arrived in the Islands with the beautiful half-white girl, with whom he exchanged a title for millions, and both he and she were welcomed in the lavish fashion of the Kanakas. They have already set about their housekeeping, and first of all was planned the bed. The woods employed are kauila and kou, the two most expensive and handsomest of Hawaiian timbers—both so rare as to be hardly obtainable. The head of the bed of kou is pierced for nine panels of kauila, polished to the highest degree. Surmounting this board, which will be placed on high posts, will be a magnificent crown, supported on either sides by sheafs of fern leaves. The bed coverings have been made by the most skilled hands at needlework, and are of the most exquisite silk, of white and green, with golden decorations. Truly a fit couch for a prince and his bride.

"How do you know he never read that historical novel?"
"Because I've seen his dramatization of it."

An Incredible Yarn

Somebody tried to spring a sensation in political circles the other day by starting the story of a rupture between Colonel Dan Burns and William F. Herrin. It was stated that the Colonel was sore because he didn't get his share of patronage. The story was no doubt started by some of the Colonel's henchmen who hope to have him taken seriously. The only political prestige that Colonel Burns enjoys came to him through William F. Herrin. He will cease to enjoy it whenever Herrin decides to cast him off.

The Owners of the Post

Since the management of the Post changed hands there has been a deal of speculation in journalistic and political circles as to the influence that now controls the paper. It was at first thought that the paper had fallen into the hands of the people who purchased and killed the Report a few years ago, but later on knowing ones declared that it had been purchased by a syndicate representing Governor Gage. Tom Garrett, the present editor, who resigned a good job in the Examiner office to become associated with Guy Barham in the new venture, stoutly declares that he and Barham are the only people that have any financial interest in the paper. This story has been discredited because nobody ever suspected that Barham and Garrett had sufficient money to purchase the Post. But, as Garrett explains, it is not impossible for men to obtain backing even in San Francisco. Garrett expects to build the paper up by the same methods which he successfully pursued on the Record in Los Angeles.

A Vocalist and Her Past

Singing in a tough beer hall in Los Angeles is an experienced actress, and pretty poetess, a composer of chants and a young woman who has run the gamut of emotions during her brief lifetime. She is Ilda Orme, and Ilda says if it were not for the wicked theatrical trust, she would now be singing round the Orpheum circuit, instead of gaining only the meagre salary and vulgar plaudits accorded to the entertainers at the Vienna Buffet in Southern California's metropolis. She says that she is living now merely for revenge, and that she will write a book shortly. Perhaps she will not live to do this. When Ilda was in her bloom she married a Michigan millionaire's son, and was separated by the proud father who pursued her like a stage villain, so she says. She appeared in London at the Trafalgar Square and other theatres, only to have her contracts canceled at the end of the first week. A dentist, in whose chair she sat for treatment, knocked out one of her front teeth. A little later a man shot her in the bosom. Then she was put in an insane asylum near London. Finally she was released through an investigation by Ambassador John Hay. All this, she says, was through the machinations of her wicked father-in-law. As soon as she arrived in New York, she laid for Marcus R. Mayer, a theatrical magnate, and horse-whipped him while Olga Nethersole looked on. Miss Orme is fascinating, but has the fatal gift of song-writing. She has been guilty of "A Lesson in Kissing," "Cupid and Champagne," and other public inflictions. She expects soon to return to San Francisco, where she will sing her own compositions.

An Old Pleasure Ground

In Charles Warren Stoddard's "Footprints of the Padres" he mentions that old pleasure ground "The Willows." He says the site is obliterated and the present generation has probably never heard of it. But there are many old Mission residents who remember The Willows. The place was situated in the hollow at Eighteenth and Howard streets, and the buildings that formerly stood on the grounds are now at Nineteenth and Mission, so modernized that they would never be recognized by Mr. Stoddard. One used to reach The Willows by a railroad or dummy line of cars, and to the children of forty years ago it was quite an eventful journey. The Willows was inundated by the big flood of the early sixties and it was a swamp for many years after that. There was a hollow full of water and venturesome gamins used to enjoy boating upon the pond in rafts. There were no sidewalks and only a sort of dam or bulkhead in the middle of Howard street, to support a single track. That had to accommodate pedestrians, teams and cars for about two blocks for a good many more than two years. The house was moved about 1876. It is fifty odd years old and one of the most ancient in the city at the present time. Bret Harte wrote a poem about The Willows, called "The Emeu."

Father Yorke's Latest

According to the Post, Father Yorke is believed to be the author of an article in the Leader of last Saturday denouncing Managing Editor Sam Leake of the Call. The Leader is a weekly paper which was launched a short time ago in the interest of the Gaelic League, and it has contained several articles which were suggestive of Father Yorke's forceful style. But Father Yorke is not posing as a journalist. It was rumored about the time of the first issue of the Leader that it was started in opposition to the Monitor, which is the organ of the Catholic Church and which is controlled by the Archbishop. It is unlikely that the Leader was started with any such purpose in view, for it makes no pretentions to be a religious organ. Yet it has taken an occasional smash at the Monitor.

The Knights of Columbus is the name of a new fraternal society which came into existence iin the East a short time ago, and a lodge of which was organized in this city a month ago. Members of the Catholic church are alone eligible to membership. The society has been attacked by the Vera Roma, a Vatican weekly of Rome, Italy, which refers to it as an organization more Masonic than Catholic, and expresses the hope that no loyal Catholic laymen, and, above all, no priest, will join it, and that those who have enrolled as members will promptly withdraw. Yet the society has the sanction of the Church in this country.

To Wipe Out the Color Line

A prominent San Francisco clubwoman is being urged to invite some representative colored women to the luncheon which she gives next week. As it is to be a small affair, covers laid for only twenty, the mingling of the races would be marked. The hostess is radical on the color question and says the idea appeals to her, but she fears some of her guests may regard it as a bit too revolutionary. The experiment was recently tried in Chicago with gratifying success, but oddly enough the initiative was taken by a colored woman. Mrs. Ida Wells-Burnett, a wealthy Chicago woman and president of an organization of colored women, invited four of the most prominent Chicago clubwomen to meet Mrs. Josephine Silone Yates, president of the National Association of Colored Women. Besides Mrs. Barnett and Mrs. Yates, there were three other colored women present. The quartet of white women were impressed with the intellectuality and good breeding of their colored sisters. The affair has created a sensation in Chicago clubdom, and Mrs. Barnett is arranging to give a series of luncheons where white women may come in contact with the people of her own race. Dr. Frances Dickinson, who is president of the Social Economic Club, was one of the guests at the first luncheon, and she is using her influence to prevent more conservative women from refusing Mrs. Barnett's invitations. Dr. Dickinson says that the colored women are not trying to squeeze in on the same social plane, but merely wish to stand side by side in the realms of higher thought. To give elaborate luncheons as the touchstone to this intellectual harmony is rather a novel method. It will be interesting to watch whether any of the San Francisco radicals take their cue from Chicago. The initiative here could hardly be taken by a colored woman, for we have not a prototype of Mrs. Barnett.

Most ladies hold the reins well. Perhaps it is not bad that they do.

Cupid in the Pound Yard

Scene.—Palace hotel; luxuriously furnished suite occupied by a couple married some months since; the lady inherited several hundred thousand dollars from a husband who ended his life very suddenly; the man inherited nothing except a lot of hustling qualities which produced nothing till he prevailed on the woman to marry him.

He: I've got several important bills to meet. Let me have a thousand, will you?

She: Not much. I gave you a thousand only day before yesterday. Why don't you pay your bills out of your business?

He: That's my affair. So you won't give me the money?

She: No. I won't; that's flat.

He: You won't, eh? Well, I know a girl who will then. (Goes to telephone and rings up one of his old flames.) Say, Sadie, meet me in an hour at the Speckled Hen and bring your diamonds. (Turning to wife.) Won't give me a measly little thousand, eh? How does that date suit you?

She: Oh, I've seen you make worse ones. Besides, I'm not running second to a selling plater like you. Watch me. (Goes to telephone in her turn and rings up Harry.) Say, Harry, meet me in an hour at the Frescoed Zebra, and bring your good looks. (Turning to husband.) I've got money and diamonds of my own and don't have to get others to furnish them. How does that suit you?

(He glares savagely at her, claps on his hat and stalks out, banging the door after him. She hums lightly, "Go Way Back and Sit Down," goes to the dresser and pins on her hat.)

Black Bart in the South

A few years ago, when a stage-robber was industriously at work in a northern county, it was suggested that perhaps the celebrated "Black Bart Po 8" had resumed business at the old stand. It was stated that after that bold robber got out of the penitentiary he left for parts unknown, and that it was not unlikely that he had returned to the field of his early operations. But Black Bart is in Los Angeles, and he has been there ever since he regained his liberty. He is a pensioner of Wells, Fargo & Co., for whose strong box he had a very tender regard. He is required to report to the company once a month. No highwayman ever caused that company so much anxiety as the elusive Black Bart.

His Favorite Verse

During the heydey of Black Bart's career on the road it was his custom to dash off a few lines of verse and place them in the Wells, Fargo box after it had been looted. He always signed them "Black Bart Po 8." His favorite lines were as follows:

Here I lay me down to sleep to wait the coming morrow;
Perhaps success, perhaps defeat and everlasting sorrow.
Let come what will I'll try it on—my condition can't be worse,
And if there's money in the box, 'twill be money in my purse.

"Sir Richard Calmady wasn't much use to the heroines of the primrose path."

"Why not?"

Married in the East

A private advice from New York tells of the recent marriage there of Miss Anna Schurman with one of the numerous Vanderbilt clan. Miss Schurman lived for some time in San Francisco, coming here from Arizona that she might cultivate her really fine voice. She studied under Mrs. Birmingham, and at one time had hopes of going on the stage. Her design, however, was firmly combated by her father, who is a prominent figure in army circles in Arizona. Miss Schurman that was, Mrs. Vanderbilt that is, is a very striking demi-blonde with a slender and graceful figure. She cared little for society when here, though her family connections and wealth would have given her the entree to the very inner circle.

Winter and a Summer Star

Willie Winter is raving over Blanche Bates just as for years he raved over Ada Rehan. His Rehan ravings used to consume pages of the Tribune, and without the divine Ada for an inspiration it was currently believed in Newspaper Row that Willie Winter would not have been able to write at all. His worship was purely that of the artist for his painting. He saw Ada Rehan only as the great star of the Daly constellation. And Winter has discovered Blanche Bates. He considers her the only legitimate successor to the great Rehan. To be sure, when Augustin Daly took Blanche Bates into his company he meant her to understudy Miss Rehan. But in a certain play Miss Bates was assigned an independent role, in which she made a bigger hit than did the star, and in less time than it took to change the bill the younger actress moved to other fields.

About Divorces

A Catholic clergyman startled his congregation the other day by producing statistics to show that there are more divorces in this country in a year than in all the countries of Europe combined. Divorces are becoming more common because they no longer affect the social standing of people. Fashion's edicts are not more strict than those of the Church, and the various Christian sects having agreed to sanction the dissolution of the marriage bonds, society withdrew its disapproval. Only a few weeks ago Mrs. Freddy Gebhard slipped off one matrimonial noose and got into another in double quick time without causing a ripple. Immediately after becoming Mrs. Henry Clews, Jr., she appeared at Mrs. Astor's ball, and she has been going everywhere ever since. There is no longer much sentiment in marriages among the rich. Genuine sentiment and affection are unknown to those who have had no experience in fighting life's battle together. Why, it is no longer unusual for our society editors to chronicle the coming of Mrs. So and So with her husband as though it were an event.

The Latest Jangle

The latest matrimonial jangle in New York according to one of my correspondents is that of the Arthur Kemps. It has not quite reached the South Dakota stage. Arthur Kemp is well known here. He visited San Francisco several years ago and was entertained at the clubs. It was three years ago that "Baby" Bell Neilson, who was a nuisance to her mother, and who smoked like a sooty chimney, married Arthur Kemp. He was not in her set, but the Kemps had acquired a fortune in toilette water. Mrs. Kemp is a niece of Freddy Gebhard and she has been taken by him to old Point Comfort with a corps of trained nurses and specialists. The Kemps are the god-parents of Virginia Fair Vanderbilt's baby.

A Family of Discords

Domestic infelicity sometimes runs in families. Take the Wallaces for instance. They are Catholics and they do not have divorces but their marriages have been most unfortunate. Belle Wallace married Mervyn Donahue and there was a separation. It wasn't her fault but he tried to deprive her of the bulk of his estate. Now she is the wife of Richard Sprague and is quite happy. After the death of Marguerite Wallace, some years ago, Horace Platt shed tears at her grave and informed the world that they had been engaged. Theirs would no doubt have been a happy marriage. Dick Wallace, a son of Judge Wallace, married a schoolteacher and the old Judge stormed because he thought that Richard couldn't support a wife. But then Richard has a mother. Nevertheless Mrs. Richard Wallace wasn't suited and she separated from her husband. About three years ago Ryland Wallace and his wife called it off and he is now living at one of the clubs. The eldest of the Wallace girls married General Sheehan, who was at one time one of the owners of the Post, and she recently returned to the parental roof tree. The General has had a hard struggle in recent years. He lost his grip and for awhile worked as gate-tender for the Santa Fe road.

One that was Overlooked

It was amusing to hear the buzzing that went on over tea-cups when the will of the late W. S. Jones was discussed. So many professed to be astonished at the fact that his old-time friend, the ci-devant Washington beauty, Mrs. Holt, was not remembered with a big legacy, but was there ever a rich man's will that gave entire satisfaction to everybody?

The visit of Mrs. Edith Hunter to her sister, Mrs. Susan Tevis, has been the occasion for a number of Lenten diversions in the way of cosy luncheons and dinners interspersed with card parties. Mrs. Hunter's daughter married the brother of Horace Platt, who has been assiduous in his attentions during her visit to the city.

He Apologized to Dewey

Some of the papers have remarked the absence of Admiral Dewey from all festivities in honor of Prince Henry. Admiral Dewey's note in answer to an invitation to a banquet to Prince Henry explained that his wife was in ill health and that he was compelled to remain in Florida. But it was looked upon by some people as a rather curt note. It is true that there was a little friction between Prince Henry and Admiral Dewey in the Orient, but the German apologized for an unintentional insult and was forgiven. It occurred at a banquet at which were present Admiral Dewey and naval representatives of several European Powers. Prince Henry toasted the rulers of all nations before toasting the President of the United States. Admiral Dewey was the ranking officer present, and according to naval etiquette the President of the United States should have been toasted immediately after Prince Henry's sovereign. It was a bad break for the Prince to make, but he is only a toy sailor, and knew no better. But Admiral Dewey took offense at the disrespect shown his commander-in-chief. Learning of this Prince Henry visited Admiral Dewey aboard the Olympia, and apologized for his blunder. The apology was accepted.

Was an Amateur Actor

Alec Basil Wilberforce, who died at Colorado Springs the other day, was a member of the amateur dramatic company I mentioned recently in connection with the visit of Mrs. Holbrook Blinn to her parents here. Wilberforce did not go to Alaska with the troupe, but he was in the cast of "Love on Crutches" when the Daly comedy was presented at the Palace hotel some time before the northern trip was undertaken. Mrs. Francisco de Ojeda and Dr. George H. H. Redding were also of the cast. Mrs. Auzerais, it will be remembered, after she divorced her husband, Louis Auzerais of San Jose, married Hereward Hoyte, the English actor, a week after his divorce from his wife, Lillian Beddard. Alec Wilberforce did not care to stay with the company as he was only an actor in his recreation hours. He was an authority on tennis and played a strong game. Though he was at one time reported engaged to a San Francisco society girl the wedding never came off. She married an Oakland man and her erstwhile fiance became the husband of Miss Sargent, a Stockton heiress.

Genevieve and Addie Meet

People who were wondering how Addie Murphy and Genevieve Goad-Reily would act when they met for the first time since Genevieve eloped with her young Lochinvar had the edge taken off their curiosity at the last hunt breakfast of the Blingumites. They had about as much to say to each other as two deaf mutes who are not on finger terms. In fact, if they even bowed it would not have been evident to a nodding mandarin. Miss Murphy sat on one side of the table and the Reilys at the opposite end. Both Genevieve and her husband cast frequent glances at Miss Addie and were evidently exchanging laughing comments about their erstwhile friend, but if they hoped to stir Miss Murphy out of her complacent poise they were deservedly disappointed. The other guests thought it rather bad form and the story has spread even to the bob-tail and tag-end of the smart set.

Hark to the Anvil Chorus

When Miss Murphy calmly announced that she herself was engaged to Mr. Reily at the time he married Genevieve Martin it was seized by the tabbies as a delicious bit of girlish candor. But it was a master stroke and has boosted Addie Murphy in inverse ratio to Robinson Reily standing. For it is not quite the thing in the code de coeur for a man to be on with the new before he is off with the old. Not that Miss Murphy's heart was broken or even cracked by the affair, because as I have before stated hers was an engagement of convenience as lightly plighted as the frothy summer girl's. But that does not palliate his conduct and the anvil chorus has not failed to use the fact. The "knockers" also hint that Miss Murphy's Washington engagement was either a myth or a clever makeshift to prove that the Martin-Reily elopement had not impaired the seat of her affections. The theory that it was a mythical romance has been advanced "half in doubt and wholly in earnest," and, if plausible, would prove Miss Murphy eligible to the diplomatic corps.

An Ingenious Plot

The news of the Zane-Cowles divorce coming as the cap-sheaf of the story Town Talk printed last week has reminded the ton of a somewhat similar scheme with a different ending, in which the present wife of a local millionaire and a young bachelor played the leading roles. The young woman was at that time unmarried, a beauty and a great belle. She had many admirers, chief among them the young man whose family had plenty of money, but no established social position. His mother did not conceal the fact that she was very keen for them to marry and there were those who openly declared that she intended to use her son's marriage as a stepladder to climb into the smart set. However, the belle kept him dangling in her train until the crafty mother began to fear that perhaps after all her son would not win the prize that would plant their feet firmly in the byways of the elite. So with the aid of a friend a clever scheme was hatched. Sonny was sent off to invite the young woman to a dinner at a French restaurant on the plea that a quartet of friends would join them. When they arrived there, of course, no friends put in an appearance and they dined a deux.

But It Failed

The next day the young man's mother called on the girl and puntuating her remarks with crocodile tears informed her that their lark had reached several ears and by night everybody in Society would probably hear it. But she would see that the young lady was not compromised and an immediate marriage could be arranged and the gossip frosted in the bud. The girl was aghast at this construction put upon their innocent little dinner and declared that the absentees would explain that she had been forced into that wild indiscretion. She positively refused to be hurried into an engagement to avoid scandal and the mother drove off, hoping she would come to her senses and realize that her reputation was at stake. The girl made inquiries at once and found that the other two couple had never even been asked to the dinner though the table was cleverly spread for six in the private dining room. She sifted the ruse to the bottom and then turned the tables by telling of the dinner, herself, and how she had been duped and almost scared into matrimony. I believe the mother and son are now in Europe and he is still a bachelor.

Miss Hopkins' Trousseau

Those who had a peep at Georgie Hopkins' trousseau were struck with the decided changes tyrant Fashion is ringing in for the coming season. Her gowns announced several of these new touches that those who cannot afford pattern styles have had no hint of. In the first place the floppy puffs that have hung over the wrist have packed their things and moved up above the elbow. And the skirts—who would have thought it?—show two deep flounces, one from toe to knee and the other from knee to waist. But only a modiste who has taken all the bias cuts and accordeon degrees in the art can attempt a skirt of this sort. For the flounces must fit close as a mermaid's scales and none of the sheath-like effect is lost. I hear that Miss Hopkins had a "coatee," made a la the one Mrs. George Pope pioneered at the Burlingame luncheon to President McKinley. Mrs. Pope's "coatee" was the sartorial sensation of that affair and was pronounced "goatee" by the wags. It was made of white broadcloth, plaited yoke length, and then falling loose just to the waist. Long stole ends of chiffon depended from the yoke to the hem of the skirt and the sleeves ended above the elbow in a Marie Antoinette flare. The diminutive double e belongs rightfully to this coat for it is a trifle, light as air. It was not taken very seriously at the time, but now it looks as if these coatees will be the rage for sunny day reception wraps.

The Presents

Georgie Hopkins' jewels were the handsomest wedding gifts received by any of the recent brides, perhaps excepting Mary Scott-Martin's jewels. The diamond brooch which was the groom's present is really a semi-necklace, for it spans half the throat. Mr. McNear, Sr., gave her a beautiful diamond pin with an aigrette shower of diamonds springing from the centre. The honeymoon at Monterey will last only until Sunday, when the young couple return here for a few days, and then go direct to Boston and Europeward by the Cunard line. Mary Crocker-Harrison and other New York friends will not be able to entertain them but a very smart dinner has been planned in their honor by Boston friends. The McNears will be a welcome addition to the San Franciscans who will attend the Coronation—the Walter Martins, Mayor Phelan and Mrs. Henry Scott.

Not Above Suspicion

Civil Service Commissioner Pin Head McCarthy says that in his opinion the report of a corruption fund having been used in the interest of candidates for promotion in the police department should not be noticed, because he does not believe it. For that reason, if for none other, Mayor Schmitz should be anxious for a thorough investigation. No honest official should be content to have such a charge made against a commission of which he is a member pass unnoticed. It is usually the crook in office who meets accusations of that character with a look of incredulity and a wave of the hand. Mr. McCarthy's reputation for honesty and integrity is not so well established in this community that his ipse dixit will be accepted in matters affecting his official conduct.

Why She Objects to Mamma

Mrs. D. D. Colton has been elected one of the vice-presidents of the Daughters of the Revolution in Washington. Mrs. Colton is making good headway socially in Washington. She is aided by the charm of her daughter and granddaughter, and in a measure by the glitter of wealth, for there is an awful lot of poor people in the Washington swim. But Mrs. Colton has a tight hold on the purse-strings. Her daughter, Mrs. McLean Martin, however, is a good spender, and there isn't much left of the fortune that came to her from her first husband. That portion inherited by her daughter, the beautiful Theodosia Cook, is still intact, and that young lady, since coming into her property, has grown extremely independent. I hear that she usually selects the ugliest woman in Washington for a chaperon. She objects to her mother as a chaperon because all her boy friends fall in love with Mrs. Martin.

The Smiths and Fairs

Some people were surprised to read in the papers that Mrs. W. H. Smith gave a dinner to Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs last week, for it was supposed that the friendship between the two families had been broken off long ago. The friendship of the Fairs and Smiths dates from the bonanza days in Nevada when Mr. Smith, then a wealthy widower, in the mining business, married Miss Emory, a handsome school-teacher of Virginia City. Mr. Smith had one daughter, Belle, and she and Tessie Fair became chums. Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Fair became very friendly about the same time. Later on Mr. Smith lost his money and the family moved to this city where the Smiths and the Fairs resumed friendly relations. Some years ago the Fair estate foreclosed a mortgage on the Smith home, and it was that circumstance that gave rise to the story of a rupture, but it appears that it was without foundation. Mr. Smith is now in Alaska seeking to mend his fortunes. His daughter Belle, the erstwhile chum of Mrs. Oelrichs, is now a book-keeper in a downtown house.

Von Schroeder the Younger

The "Baron Aleck" von Schroeders are back from Boston, where they have been visiting and are going to live on the ranch near Paso Robles. Mrs. Cutler, who became the wife of the young baron, is a refined, interesting looking woman with red hair and eyes that baffle. The elder baron, who is still intent on prosecuting that nauseating libel suit, is very prosperous these days at the Hotel Rafael which, after many years, bids fair to pay more than expenses. He expects to have golf links for his summer visitors.

Launching of the Schooner-Yacht "Meteor"

On the front page of Town Talk, this issue, will be noticed the official menu of the luncheon to the President of the United States and H. R. H. Prince Henry of Prussia on the occasion of the launching of the schooner-yacht Meteor, February twenty-fifth, 1902, built for H. G. M., the Emperor of Germany, by the Townsend-Downey Shipbuilding company of New York. Moet & Chandon White Seal champagne had the distinction of being served exclusively.

And the Matron Fled

This story comes to me all the way from New York. It is about a Californian matron who has taken up her residence in Gotham and who has never presented her husband with a pledge of affection. She was apartment hunting in the neighborhood of Second avenue and Livingstone place. She entered a building and met the Irish janitor, to whom she explained that she would like to get rooms in the building.

"Iv it's a case iv emergincy ye can," he said, looking her up and down.

"How many rooms can I have?" she asked.

"One as a rule, ma'am, but maybe ye can have two iv ye wants them."

"But my husband—"

"Husband!" interrupted the janitor, "ye can't have any husband here."

"What sort of a place is this?" she asked.

"It's J. Pierpont Morgan's Maternity Hospital," he replied, and the young matron fled.

Dabbles in Music

If Emil Bruguiere were not so bald, he'd be looking positively juvenile these days. For he is absurdly happy, as joyous as a boy with his first pair of trousers or his first love. The reason is that his name appears on the program of Mrs. Katherine Fisk's first recital. The great contralto will sing Emil Bruguiere's "The Gardner and the Rose." This is not by any means the first time one of his compositions has been played in public, for various local theatre orchestras have played Emil Bruguiere's waltzes and morceaux. But "The Gardner and the Rose" is placed a notch higher in being chosen by Mrs. Fisk, to be rendered along with the compositions of Saint-Saens, Brahms, Schubert, Chaminade and Nevin. Young Bruguiere has been composing beautiful melodies ever since he was able to distinguish the difference between a fish horn and a cornet. He wrote the "Lucille" waltzes when he was just out

Ladies Doing Politics

California club politics are still at a white heat. But the ladies expect to settle all their difficulties, restore harmony and lure back the white-winged bird in the good old-fashioned Democratic way—with the aid of the ballot box. The annual election has been set for March eighteenth, and after that date the California will be a united club again, for the members have covenanted with one another that the minority shall submit as gracefully as possible to the majority's will. For the first time in its four years of life there will be two tickets in the field, and a lively time is expected. The ladies of both factions are doing some tall hustling and the rivalry is keen and just a little bit bitter. Many members think that it would have been better if the Australian ballot system had been in vogue from the beginning for then the members would have been able to express a choice in the selection of their officers.

What Some of the Ladies Say

It is the sentiment of many that the club has been officered too long by the same women, and they are anxious for a change. Mrs. Lovell White, who has been in many ways an able officer, has become tyrannical, they say, during the last years of her administration. She is an ambitious, domineering woman, say her opponents, and they even charge her with having a rule or ruin policy, and with having driven many good women from the club. One of their objections to her is that she loses her head in the chair and affronts those on the floor who don't agree with her. They declare that since she reconsidered her resignation there have been more than twenty-five resignations from the club, and that an examination of the year book shows that only a few of the original members remain. The club has actually decreased in membership during the past year. Yet, in spite of drawbacks, the club has accomplished much good work and has made a name for itself throughout the length and breadth of California. They are confident, despite the bickerings, that the good work will go on and that next year the club will be officered by just and fair-minded women, who are anxious for the club to return to its old ideals of democratic government, from which it has wandered of late.

Why Mrs. Cotton is Objectionable

The personnel of the two tickets that will be presented is shrouded in mystery, but it seems scarcely likely that the club will elect Mrs. Aylett Cotton, who is said to be the choice of the nominating committee for the head of the regular ticket. The objection to her is that she is too close to Mrs. White and the club members feel that her election as president would mean that Mrs. White was president by proxy. By a clever coup, Mrs. White obtained control of the nominating committee, eight of the nine members being her supporters. The club was juggled out of its right to select this committee by means that were illegal and unconstitutional and, as a result, the election of delegates to Los Angeles went heavily against Mrs. White, the entire opposition ticket being elected. The strained relations existing in the club between those who are standing for the dictator and a one-woman club, and those who are standing for the rights of the club have developed some clever club politicians among the women. It is considered a masterly coup which placed Mrs. White's name at the head of the opposition ticket of delegates to Los Angeles. This stroke so astounded the enemy and so took the wind from their sails that before they had collected themselves, the little white ballots were floating into the box and they had lost the day by an overwhelming vote. Every delegate elected to Los Angeles, with the sole exception of Mrs. White, is in favor of admitting colored clubs to the general federation.

Miss Gorham on Duty

The ladies representing the opposition to Mrs. White have been holding meetings recently in the Occidental hotel, and they have been industriously engaged in preparations for the fray. At the last meeting Miss Mary Gorham, the secretary of the club, and the intimate friend of Mrs. White, was observed hovering near the hotel entrance. It was immediately surmised that she was there as Mrs. White's representative for the purpose of sizing up the strength of the enemy. When the ladies upstairs heard of her presence they sent down to invite her to join them but she refused and beat a retreat.

Mrs. Henry T. Scott is one of this week's hostesses of Lenten functions and her forty guest tea in honor of General Young's friends from Washington was as swagger an entertainment as any in the middle of the season past. Flowers, decorations and feasting were all features of the affair.

Newhall on Corning

It is easy to acquire the reputation of being well informed if you know how and are not beset by scruples. When the Northern California boomers were discussing ways and means in this city, a short time ago, George Newhall of the Chamber of Commerce sat at the reporters' table and listened to the speakers. A man named Foster from Corning was one of them, and during his address Newhall turned to the reporters and said, "Where in the h—— is Corning?"

"It's an eating station in Tehama county," said one of the reporters. "It's famous for fried chicken. They serve it three times a day and it's the best I ever ate."

A little later Newhall took occasion to address the boomers and in the course of his remarks he said that tourists were attracted by good hotel accommodations. "Now there's Corning," he said, "up in Tehama county; I've stopped there many times and enjoyed the fried chicken that is served there. I never tasted such delicious fried chicken anywhere outside of Corning."

Mr. Foster of Corning was delighted and applauded Mr. Newhall vociferously.

Girding the Gullible

The regular spring army of perambulating freaks is rising in the East and heading westward with San Francisco as a mecca. It is made up of the blowhards who claim they have wagered a fortune that they will girdle the earth in umpty-steen days, dine with the President, marry an heiress, eat every other week, never use soap and return to their admiring friends with a bank account that hasn't cost them a cent. They all belong to the faker class and the boasting given them by gullible people along the route enables them to travel in a manner sublimely careful to themselves. This year's procession now on the way to San Francisco is headed by a bandy-legged glib Apollo, named Harry Adonis. His story is that he must push a wheelbarrow to this city in six months, make fifteen hundred dollars on the way, marry an auburn-haired girl, not be arrested more than twelve times and dine with the mayors of at least six cities. At last accounts he was stubbing his toes somewhere in the wilds of Michigan and claimed to have collected seven hundred and fifty dollars of his money through distributing advertisements. Apparently Schwab of the Steel Trust was right when he said at a recent banquet that there was plenty of money in this world for the man with ideas and push—even if it is only pushing a wheelbarrow on such a wild-eyed claim.

Planned an Automobile Trip

While Mrs. Oelrichs is sojourning here looking after her business interests her sister, Mrs. Vanderbilt, will go on an automobile trip over Europe. Her health has not been good of late and the doctors have rec ommended this kind of outdoor exercise to improve it. "Willie" K. has been having a special automobile built at Cronstatt, Germany, to illustrate his ideas of what an ideal machine should be. The young couple have planned to start their trip at that place.

As a Matron Saw Them

Mrs. Oelrichs and Ailene Ivers Robinson are responsible for the Lenten gayety which has made this rather a season of feasting than of fasting. Society could not afford to lose the opportunity of putting its best foot forward for it isn't often that two such social iions come back to their native lair. At a smart little tea the other day the striking similarities and differences in these two women were sharply drawn by an observant matron. In the first place Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Robinson are at the opposite beauty poles—one as dark as the Maids of the Medici, the other fair as the Lily Maid of Astolat. But "our Tessie" had wealth and established local position whereas Ailene Ivers was not burdened with overmuch worldly goods and her niche in the smart set was rather draughty at times. Miss Fair married a man comparatively poor, but with several generations of ancestors who brushed their teeth twice a day—which removes one from the polloi who think one brushing sufficient. Mrs. Ivers married a very wealthy man, but the Robinson social position was rather weak at the knees until beautiful Ailene Ivers-Robinson won the Quaker City gratin du gratin with her charm and tact. Mrs. Oelrichs found her cake baked, but Mrs. Robinson had a finger in making hers. However, she had the necessary ingredients—beauty, wealth and savoir faire. No smart affair in Philadelphia is now considered complete without her presence and New York is beginning to sit up and take notice of this clever Californienne. Her sister, Mrs. Irwin, is still heart-broken over the death of her only son, so her entertaining is limited to small luncheons—such as she gave Mrs. Oelrichs—and informal dinners. However, Mrs. Robinson is being feted everywhere and is pronounced irresistible.

The Ladies' Promenade

There's a new fad among smart theatre-goers—an outgrowth, I should judge, of the grand opera habit. No longer does the fascinating matron sit alone and unattended in her stall or box while her husband seeks the lobby and its environs. She goes out with him. I

A New Department

In this weeks' issue of Town Talk appears a new department, "With the Money Makers." It is to be devoted to the interests of people whose capital is invested in stocks and in all sorts of business enterprises. My colleague, The Financier, purposes to keep in touch with financial affairs, to investigate financial problems and investment securities and furnish conservative opinions thereon. This department will not be conducted in the interest of any broker or combination of brokers. Whatever reliable information is obtainable about properties will be published, and particular attention will be paid to shams and frauds.

Nevada in Classic Robes

The costume Emma Nevada wore at her concert Monday night created more comment than her singing, and the remarks were not of a complimentary nature. Why a woman who has left her youth far in the background should have elected to garb herself so unbecomingly, in a manner to betray all her physical shortcomings, is a mystery. Sappho, the Grecian poetess of passion, may have looked her best in the classic robes of her time, but assuredly Emma Nevada looks her best in modern costume. She has any number of beautiful Parisian gowns, made to show the really fine lines of her figure, and it was a disappointment to her friends that she did not wear one of those instead of that none too fresh looking classic affair. Her old style of hairdressing, too, is infinitely to be preferred to the Psyche knot which, though in harmony with the costume, is not to be worn with impunity by any except the young and beautiful.

The Boarders Startled

The gossips at the Colonial—and there are a few—have been discussing a Bill and Nancy Sykes episode that disturbed the peace and quiet of the house the other night. They say it will probably have its sequel in the divorce court. It was only a case of a man chastising his wife. But from the sounds that startled the boarders they believed he was using her body as a mop with her hair as a handle. Rather a coarse and brutal thing for a club man to do. And yet his friends say he is a good fellow. It was only a few months ago that wedding bells rang out for the happy pair.

A Veteran of the Second Empire

An occasional correspondent writes me from Paris that Madame Rattazzi de Rute died in that city on February fifteenth. She was one of the few surviving ladies of the brilliant Court of the Second Empire. The only ones still living are the Empress Eugenie, Princess Mathilde and the famous Madame Schnieder. Madame de Rute, who styled herself Marie Laetitia Bonaparte de Rute, was the granddaughter of Prince Lucien Bonaparte and Madame de Bleschamp, his second wife, and daughter of Sir Thomas Wyse, an Irishman, who was at one time British Minister at Athens, and of Laetitia Bonaparte, niece of the great Napoleon.

Banished for Tattling

The deceased lady who was at one time a very prominent figure in French society had three husbands. The first was Prince Frederick de Solons, the second, Urbain Rattazzi, the Italian statesman, and the third Louis de Rute, deputy of the Spanish Cortes. She was banished from the country by Napoleon III for libelous accusations against his wife, the Empress Eugenie. She received the insignia of most European orders, and her life was written by Eugene Sue.

Brisk Demand for Calves

From the same correspondent I learn that artificial calves are being manufactured in Paris which are to be worn at the Coronation festivities. "We are not all blessed with a well-filled garter," writes my correspondent, and when, according to rules of precedent and etiquette, knee breeches must be donned, if Nature has been unkind to the wearer he must call in artificial aid. The trade in artificial calves is very brisk, but even without such an incentive as the Coronation fetes the industry does not lag, for French cyclists, society men—yea, and society women—invest in those ornaments for the emaciated limb.

The Hit of the Ball

The bal masque given by the J. D. Spreckels' on Thursday lived up to the sky-scraper expectations. With a few mirth provoking exceptions the guests were magnificent in brocade and patches, but though they held up the picture end of the affair, the comics were the sauce piquant that gave a tang to the ball. The most original character and the one best sustained was the "Sandwich Man" of Ethyl Hager. Miss Hager's get-up was in imitation of the human sign boards that walk the streets. A linen duster such as is de rigueur with the "Knights of the Road" covered all but an inch or two of trousers that had seen better days. On the bald crest of a molasses colored wig, perched a liliputian derby that looked more like a huge fly and was indescribably droll. Miss Ethyl's feet turned traitor to the observant who know there is only one tall girl in the smart set with such dainty Cinderellas. However, it was a long time before her identity was community property, and a crowd constantly elbowed about her to read the long canvas frame in which she was caged. On one side was the flaring advertisement:

"Meals! Meals! Meals!

"Never Touch Me House, corner Sherman and Clay streets, between Lotta's Fountain and the Old Ladies' Home.

"Any Repast Served at All Hours, and No Questions Asked.

"The Glad Hand Extended to All Customers and a Warm Welcome for Weary Waggles."

Her Menu Offering

On the other side was this delectable menu, from which the cotillon leaders were seen to take notes for future suppers.

"Political Soup for the Disappointed.

"Hearts, Any Style, for Coquettes.

"Soft Shell Crabs for Hard Shell Baptists.

"Tarts a la Carrie Nation.

"Lady Fingers, 5 Cents; Manicured, 10 Cents.

"Greenway Celery Salad, late of Utah, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

"Wines—Mumm.

"N. B.—Dog Biscuit Served with All Ten Cent Orders."

The idea of the "Sandwich Man" was Miss Hager's own, and the originality of the conception and the wit with which it was carried out has reaped an aftermath of admiring comments.

The McAllisters

Apropos of the item in last week's Town Talk regarding the recent divorce of one of the Rev. Marion McAllister's daughters, it may not be generally known that that gentleman made his clerical debut in San Francisco. At that time—the later fifties—the entire McAllister family made its home in this city, including Judge and Mrs. McAllister pere et mere, their sons Hall and Cutler and their wives, and their only daughter, who afterwards married her cousin, Samuel Francis of New York. Ward, the New York society leader, had been here also, but, disgusted with our crudeness, returned to his beloved Gotham, where he married an heiress. The Reverend Marion had not long been ordained, and Mrs. McAllister, who was a born manager, thought it would be a good scheme to get him out here and make him pastor of a fashionable church.

"The Holy McAllister"

Acting upon this idea, the co-operation of William G. Badger was secured, the young curate sent for, and upon his arrival a hall taken in Second street where afternoon services were held, with Mrs. Hall McAllister as leader of an amateur choir, her voice being a powerful magnet, which drew as many to hear her sing as to listen to Bible doctrine as expounded by the blond young parson. By degrees enough coin was raised to start and then finish the building in Howard street, over which the Reverend Marion ruled for many years. It was known as the Church of the Advent, but by the irreverent of those days termed the Church of "The Holy McAllister."

The Post-Lenten Season

The post-Lenten season is to shine with exceptional brilliancy, although very briefly, as most of the fashionable throng will hie to Blingum, San Rafael and Del Monte. The arrival of the George Crockers will reopen the old homestead on Nob Hill, and people are whispering about a reception Mrs. Crocker will give there before leaving town for Monterey. A large contingent of the smart set is booked for Del Monte in the wake of the Alexanders. The Whitelaw Reids will tarry at Millbrae as guests of D. O. Mills. "Oddy" Mills' twin daughters have never yet honored California by a visit, but they will take in King Edward's coronation in June, dividing their time in London between their mother's sister, Mrs. Cavendish-Bentinck, and their aunt, Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who, as the wife of the Special Ambassador, can give them exceptional advantages.

IN THE REALM OF FASHION

The most important function at this season to the fashionable woman is the millinery opening. Neither tea nor luncheon can successfully dispute favor with the milliner's opening day. It is doubtful if the coming of H. R. H. Prince Henry would attract more attention. The proper thing with the modish milliner is to issue cards for her opening, as if for a private reception. It is indeed that for only a favored few receive the invitations. The smartest milliners no longer have stores to display their confections. The proper thing is to be located in parlors, upstairs in some large building. The most exclusive trade in millinery in this city is that carried on by Mrs. E. B. Folsom, who caters exclusively to society people. Her parlors in Room C, third floor, 121 Post street, are typically those of the milliner a la mode. Mrs. Folsom's spring opening, which will come off next Tuesday and Wednesday, is looked forward to with the most intense expectancy by the women of the swim. Mrs. Folsom promises some stunning creations in French pattern hats, the choicest ideas of the Paris milliners. She also has some charming children's hats which will be just the thing for Easter.

Book of My Ancestry

Every now and then our fashionable storekeepers are taxed mentally to keep up the interest of the ultra swagger set who demand novelty in the several lines of trade. The latest idea brought out by the proprietor of a Post street bookstore will hardly find favor with the nouveau riche. It is a large book bearing on its cover in gold letters the words "Book of My Ancestry," with places for photographs of the same inside and spaces for remarks on each. This scheme to bring our progenitors into view will not, for obvious reasons, find favor among our swells. Fancy the contrast of "then and now" that would arise in the mind of the one inspecting the volume! And how useless to drag good people now resting in the shades of the past into the broad glare of today. No, no; it will surely never "catch on" here unless the publisher does the magician act and manufactures ancestors to order, in which case the bill rendered for the same might be itemized as follows:

For tracing descent from an Irish king;
For discovering a far back Judge, etc., etc.

THE SEARCH THAT FAILED.

[Respectfully Dedicated to the S. F. Bohemian Club]

An old Bohemian, long dead,
Grew weary of his narrow bed
So shaking off his molder'd clay
He climbed into the light of day.
Upon his tombstone for awhile
He mused, with reminiscent smile,
Recalling from Time's azure haze
The joys of his younger days.

Full soon—as memory brought up
The merry quip, the sparkling cup,
The jest, the laughter, that of old
Had given something of life's gold—
Beneath his shroud his longing grew
To see again the merry crew
That nightly, at Bohemia's shrine
Drowns stupid Care with song and wine.

"No doubt," thought he, "they're dead, or gray,
Who made the music in my day;
For Death and Age still levy toll
And change will mar the brightest roll.
So, haply, most of those I knew
Are lost in 'Time's remotest blue,'
But well know I Bohemia's grace—
I ween bright minds still throng the place!

"Still in the Redroom's warm old heart
Does star-eyed Science think apart;
There dreams the Bard with far-sent eyes
And to his vision quick replies
His keen-eyed brother of the pen,
Whose lore is yet of earth and men;
While lost in Genius' rapt hush,
The artist wields his dream-held brush!"

So mused the old Bohemian's shade
And of his dreams such sweetness made,
He scorned the silence of the dead
Resolved to feed where Genius fed;
Where haply, at Bohemia's shrine
He might see rosy Bacchus shine,
Hear Triton's horn and Pan's clear reed
Nor be oppressed by Mammon's greed.

He went; he perched beside the Owl
Unnoticed as that lonely fowl.
Time passed; full many mortals came
But few immortals, touched with flame.
He counted plumbers by the score
Whose wealth had oped for them the door,
Pawn-brokers, too, and, fit and meet,
These talked with "kings" of fish and wheat!

Amazed, astonished, at the sight,
But still not fully in the light,
The Shade still kept his unseen perch
And swept each face with keenest search,
Seeking to find, amid the throng,
Some child of Literature or Song,
Some learned mind, some cultured soul,
Whom Plutus had not in control.

Alas! the search was nearly vain;
Few, few were there amid the train
On whom the Grecian light was shed;
And few who walked with Cadmus-tread.
But sadder still, he saw 'mong these,
Scarce one blessed by the Pleiades;
Scarce one, but heard above the call
Of Hero, Plutus loudly bawl!

* * * * * *

The owl stirred not, but from his side
The Shade departed, heavy-eyed;
And as he sought his grave again
Wailed out the burden of his pain:
"Gone is Bohemia's olden light!
Gone merry High-jinks, solemn Rite;
No more gives Wit his seasoned dish,
And Wisdom 's buried under fish!

"The Midas hand is on the wall;
Big-bellied Plutus owns the hall.
Where erst were heard Arion's strains,
The plumber, fresh from vaults and drains,
Shakes high his tongs, and, as he drinks,
His plebeian dollars loudly clinks!
Farewell Bohemia! Thou'rt abased;
The grave is meet for souls disgraced!"

Those that are old in experience flatter themselves that they are immune to the temptations that beset the pathway of the young, and occasionally they find that they have reached second childhood.

COLORADO CLAY—ITS REMARKABLE EFFECT UPON THE HAIR.

Turns white hair black, brown, auburn, or Titian red. Restores gray hair to its original color without changing the natural colors. Peroxide ends made to equal the new hair growing out. Bleached hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the clay bath. The strongest shampoo will not affect it, nor does the clay stain the scalp in any particular.

BEST ON EARTH

"Only a Cuckoo, at the Best"

[A woman died in a tenderloin lodging house the other day and among her effects was found a journal. On the first page was copied Edmund Clarence Stedman's poem "Anonyma." The following are extracts from the volume.]

The Tenderloin is looked upon by the enviously pure as a region where true happiness is found. To the one who has never trod the primrose path Tenderloin is but a synonym for Paradise. To the man who is by force of circumstances compelled to keep away from its fascinations the Tenderloin contains all the elements of the delightfully unattainable. As a matter of fact, the Tenderloin is not at all what it is fancied. Instead of delightful, read it dull and common. Naughty and nice do not always, as the schoolgirl fancies, go together. One can grow blase on vice as on virtue. Dear God, do I not know? I have often wondered why the respectable look with such longing gaze over the barbed-wire fence that separates them from Us. There is nothing esthetic about indecency. Immorality, particularly in large American cities, is not of refined quality. I should like to respect our Tenderloin, but I cannot. It is neither brilliant nor graceful. If it were even picturesque the esthetic might admire it, if not embrace it, but alas! it is not.

* * * * * * * *

I hate the men that seek my favors. They are low, vulgar—bah! nothing can change them. They are as God made them. Lord told me last night that I was the only woman (of my class, he meant, but his courtesy omitted that part) on whom he would waste an hour. He comes here every day. I like him better than his son, who calls on Thursdays. The latter is a cheap sport, though he belongs to one of the first families and to all the best clubs. He has no wonderful qualities that inspire to brilliant escapades. He is dull, always dull. And he says he loves me. Nothing lowers me more in my own estimation than to be forced to listen to his protestations. Why do I do it? Why don't I leave this life and escape to a higher sphere? I do not know. More than one man has offered me the means of release. But I was born here; here was I bred; here I have always lived; here I must die. It is a fatality. Perhaps I do not wish to be released from this bondage. I don't know.

* * * * * * * *

I went to Del Monte with Millions last week for the sports. Millions is independent of the public. He has no wife to affront, no children to consider. I laughed to myself at the glances cast in my direction by the virtuous haut ton. One matron drew her skirts aside as I passed by her in the club-room. Yet that woman's husband is one of my most frequent visitors. A pretty young girl won my heart. She looked always so gracious, and said "Good morning" to me more than once. I wish I could save her from the match she has entered into. Do I not know her fiance, a worthless debauche? "A deuce of a fellow," his own set call him, and his reputation as a profligate evidently makes him a god in his betrothed's eyes. But I know him so thoroughly—he will kill that young heart as surely as he has killed his own soul.

* * * * * * * *

I read today: "Manon had her Des Grieux, but every woman of her caste has her Des Grieux." It is true. Camille had her Armand, Sapho her Jean, and Zaza had her soul lover, too. Have I one? I think not. My Des Grieux died years ago and I think I died with him.

* * * * * * * *

No, he did not die. I saw him today. He has had trouble with his wife, Lord tells me.

* * * * * * * *

Dieu merci! My Des Grieux is not the least little bit dead. He came to me today. We said nothing of the past. He approached me like a stranger. Does he love me? He says so. But then he is piqued now at the attitude his wife has taken against him.

* * * * * * * *

I was dining with Millions today, when my Des Grieux rode by. He was with that pretty girl I met at Del Monte during the week of sports. She is his daughter it seems. She saw me and smiled. She nodded her golden head and waved a kiss at me with her whip. Millions laughed, as Des Grieux, who is shortsighted, tried to see whom his daughter had bowed to. We flew past so fast he failed to recognize me.

* * * * * * * *

Lord tells me that if I will give up Des Grieux his wife will take him back. I give him up? Why, I have only found him again. For years and years he was hers. She thrust him from her and he hid his wounded head in my arms. God! what do these society women have in their breasts? Stones, stones!

* * * * * * * *

I am going away with him. Apres tout, why should I not? I have his love.

* * * * * * * *

The pretty girl has won. Des Grieux shall go back to his wife. After all, Camille was a true creation. Am I not doing the same? Yesterday I would not have consented. Today—well, the pleadings of that young blonde creature broke my resolution. I will go back to my life. I have given the father to his daughter, the husband to his wife. Poor Zaza!

* * * * * * * *

He comes here still, though the pretty girl is his wife now. Oh, the contemptible! He could not exist in that pure atmosphere but must come back to the cafe tittle-tattle, the stale aroma of the Tenderloin. How vile men are. From her he came to me. Well, after all, I could not refuse. I gave her her father, now I take her husband. Fair exchange, n'est-ce-pas? Besides, he is out of worse mischief when he is here.

* * * * * * * *

I saw her today, but she did not greet me. She turned her head the other way. Some one has told her, I suppose. Well, what can I tell her? Can I say he was my lover long before he met her and wooed her money? No. I can but shrug my shoulders and pass on. Others more worthy than I have been misunderstood. The best thing for her would be for him to pass out of her life forever. Contact with him is desecration to her.

* * * * * * * *

I am heartsore. Lord is dead, my good friend. He left me a legacy. That was kind of him. He knows how I hate this life and would give me the means to forsake it if I wish. But do I wish? I am always asking myself that question.

With the Money Makers

A King-pin Promoter

"J. R. Guelph-Norman," is the sign on his office door in the Mills building. He will sell you an interest in a ruby mine in Burma, or will invest your money in Oriental securities. He is the head of the Burma Ruby Mining and Development Company, is very English in his accent and appearance; wears a tall hat, a frock coat, and a preacher-like cravat. Slow-spoken, picking his words like one choosing the biggest nuts in a bowl, J. Rex. Guelph-Norman is decidedly impressive. He will tell you much of interest about India; he will descant for hours on the opportunities for capital in Burma. He will take your money and write in a beautiful hand on large and handsomely-engraved certificates, a receipt for what money you will yield. But he will not tell you that once he was a yogi, a seer of the Far East, a cabalist, and a marvel in the black art. He will not tell you that four years ago he was in Ludlow street jail in New York, charged with attempting to swindle a woman by hypnoptic power. He will not tell you that beautiful and rich women have gone into convulsions, merely by being looked on by J. R. Guelph-Norman. You will find it hard to persuade him to say that he is a son of the present King of England. But he did say all these things when a few years ago he came out of the East and into New York, heralded as a Mahatma of Mahatmas, a disciple of Buddha, and one far on the rough road toward Nirvana. Here he is content now to be a financier, a finder of precious stones, and a quintupler—so he says—of all monies placed with him for investment.

Raising the Wind

It was the millions of Charles Broadway Rouss, merchant, which lured the King's son to New York. Rouss was stone blind. He offered a million to him who would make him see. Guelph-Norman knew he had worked wonders on women. Why not play for a fortune? Rouss gave him a fortnight. Then he cast him out as a faker. En passant, Rouss died this week but he never saw for eight years. In Gotham Guelph-Norman married in 1898 Mrs. Harriet Hall Bedlow Morris, a belle and beauty of Newport and Europe, the daughter of a former mayor of Newport, a widow of Commander Francis Morris, U. S. N. He was discoursing before the Theosophical Society of New York. Mrs. Morris was listening. Suddenly she fell in a spasm to the floor. "Take him away!" she cried, moaning and shrieking the while. The doctors said she exhibited signs of acute hypnosis. The next morning she arose, apparently well, called her carriage, and drove straight to Norman's apartments. Eight days later she wedded him. He told every one then that he was the son of the then Prince of Wales, by a marriage made before he married into the Kingdom of Denmark. "Rex Guelph-Norman" typified his descent. He showed papers and other proofs to substantiate his statements. The beautiful widow Morris thought she would some day be the Queen of England.

More Exciting Experience

This was one woman. Another, Mrs. Schlatter, kept a small eating house in Canal street in New York. After a few days' acquaintance Yogi Norman asked her for $2,000. He got it, but later she had him haled to prison on a swindling charge. Lawyers were retained by Mrs. Morris' family, and a courier despatched to India to bring back the wife Rex Guelph-Norman was alleged to have in Burma—the land where he says the rubies grow like hens' eggs in Petaluma. It is said they found her there by the old Moulmein Pagoda, watching and waiting where the flying fishes play, and the dawn comes up like thunder from China 'crost the bay. This was in May, 1898.

In June, 1899, a sign at 304 McAllister street read:

Mr. J. R. G. Norman
Of Farther India,
Successfully treats by the Oriental System of Ayurveda
Blindness, Failing Vision, and other Diseases of a Physical or Mental Nature.

Now this was the same son of Albert Edward. He wore when busy a robe of wonderful tint and texture, a turban tied as only yogis can tie turbans, and an air of mystery, which did everything but pay his rent. He said he was here to establish the Royal Asiatic Academy. Today he is in the Mills building. Gone are the turban, toga and tinsel, and instead he dons the silk tile and white neckerchief of ministerial respectability. No longer a doctor or a yogi, Guelph-Norman seeks your patronage as an investor. One word in your ear: If you are a woman and go to his office be careful of the bright blue eyes, which gleam balefully like the great ruby on his finger. Look into them once and you may become Mrs. J. Rex Guelph-Norman, with a chance for a crown or a padded cell.

Busy Southern Pacific

Says a financier: When Chicago and Northwestern stock was selling in the market around 85 in 1896, the trader regarded it as a dubious commodity. He was willing to scalp in it, but didn't care to put it away. He thought it was too high. Now that it has reached a permanent bond basis above 200, people are apt to think that its appreciation has been due to some unique and unusual development. They do not accept it as a type of what may come to pass in any well-administered property in a fruitful territory. Take the Southern Pacific. Its stock may be bought a little above 64, but the average trader is afraid of it. "It pays no dividends." He thinks it is too high—that it will go much lower. But the financial geniuses of the Union Pacific system do not entertain such doubts about it. They take $75,000,000 of it and mortgage 1,047 miles of the best main track railway to pay for it. Why do they do it if Southern Pacific stock is of uncertain value between 60 and 70? They know its immense earning power and dividend capacity. The plain truth is, that Southern Pacific is the opportunity at present open to the investment buyer. Oil and irrigation are the keyword of the situation. Oil means manufacturing and irrigation means an almost limitless agricultural output. The resultant is tonnage.

Growth of Its Business

Since 1885 the Southern Pacific proprietary system has earned net in excess of expenses and all interest and rental charges about $54,300,000, nearly all of which has been put back into the property. This excess earning power capitalized at 3 per cent would mean something like an additional investment of $106,000,000. The total capital stock issue is under $198,000,000. The capital assets foot up about $631,000,000. Mortgage liens and other funded liabilities are about—say, $353,000,000. There remains an equity for the stock, based on fixed assets, so wide and ample as to take it at once out of the speculative category. By the end of this year it will have 25 per cent of its locomotives fitted to burn oil. Two or three years more and all the motive power will be derived from Texas and California oil. Suppose the saving for fuel is 50 per cent—that means $3,500,000 a year that may be used for betterments or for dividends. Nothing has been said about the normal growth of Southern Pacific traffic. In 1901 the increase in ton mileage was 14.8 per cent. From 1890 to 1900 inclusive the increase in

Why He Didn't Kick

A husband sat unmoved and calm,
And oft appeared to smile,
Although his wife was flirting in
A most disgraceful style.

He did not utter one complaint,
Nor seem to think it wrong,
While on a lover's lips she pressed
Her kisses loud and long.

Perhaps you wonder how he thus
Could curb his righteous rage;
He saw this, sitting in the stalls,
His wife was on the stage.

STAGE

A Live Lover

I always used to think that the only stage lovers worthy the name were Frank Worthing and William Faversham. There have been others who make stage love, of course, but their ways were not the ways of Worthing and Faversham. And now comes Dustin Farnum to snatch the laurels from the brow of those others. Because of Lieutenant Denton, Eleventh U. S. Cavalry, Augustus Thomas may be forgiven many sins of omission, including an exceedingly dull first act, in this latest play of his. For Lieutenant Denton, as played by Mr. Farnum, is a lover for matinee girls to sigh over and send bouquets and mash notes. He is all the best of Captain—General—Charles King's heroes rolled into one. To him fall all the noble deeds, the crowning one an act of self-sacrifice where he saves his Colonel's wife from disgrace and discovery. There's nothing new in this situation but as Mr. Farnum plays it it is invested with the interest of a more novel condition. It is toward Grace Elliston, as Bonita Canby the younger daughter of the owner of Aravaipa ranch that the manly young army officer directs his love-making. They make a delightful pair of lovers. Miss Elliston's role is that of a gay, care-free, lively young girl with a fine earnestness of character beneath the light surface. Henry Canby, the ranch owner, is a character strongly drawn and which is given its full strength by Harrison Armstrong, who plays it. Another well acted role is the Chinese cook, Sam Wong, by Stanley Murphy. The third act of "Arizona" is the best. The dialogue, except in the first act, is in its author's best vein. "Arizona" is the kind of a play that will be a favorite in stock theatres after it has been taken from the road.

The Art of Burlesque

There is nothing so delightful as burlesque when it is well done. In New York there is always some sort of a burlesque on at Weber & Field's, and it is seldom that a burlesque of some kind is not making a hit on Broadway. Just now it is "The Hall of Fame" that is making all New York laugh, for though it is a poor thing as a whole some of the players are of the kind that can make anything go. To burlesque well means the possession of natural mental agility on the part of the burlesquer. At the gambols of the Lamb's club they present burlesques that are the best of their kind, just as they do at the Bohemian club jinks. And I have known Ferris Hartman to get off some delicious satires of this kind. Charlie Reed used to have a burlesque every week at his little Standard theatre, and those were the real things in their line. For instance, he had one burlesque on "The Mikado," then running at one of the theatres, which he called "Micky Do," and when a great star was playing "Camille" here one of Reed's burlesques was a striking takeoff on her portrayal of the consumptive Marguerite. Nick Long and Idalene Cotton did a very clever burlesque on "Zaza" in their vaudeville skit during one season. The people like burlesque and there is no reason therefore why they should not support it to the extent of one theatre. Mr. Friedlander's idea is to have Fischer's a standard burlesque house. "The French Maid" does well enough as a starter. "Little Christopher," which comes next, is a better vehicle for burlesque talent. The company is strong enough to cope with greater difficulties in vocal dramatics than have yet fallen to it, and the pretty girls in the chorus should soon enlist the attentions of the local Johnnies.

A Clean Comedy

I wish there were more comedies like "At the White Horse Tavern." It makes one sigh for the pies that mother used to make, the comedies that Crane and Robson and Goodwin and Sol Smith Russell and the rest used to act in before the smart and risque became the mode. Sidney Rosenfeld wrote the play that is the Alcazar's bill this week. It is not a brand new comedy but it is new enough to last a few years more without introducing patchy specialties to make it go. The stock is acting uniformly well this week, so it is hard to pick stars. Osborne has the part of the old Berlin merchant whose family persuaded him to travel. He does it well. Osbourne is a constant refutation of the saying that no one can do anything worthy after a certain age. He acts better now if anything than he did years ago. Miss Wycherly is the hostess of the tavern who has fallen in love with the young attorney (Mr. Alsop). There are some very pretty scenes in which the hostess, the attorney and Ottilie (Miss Convere) appear. Miss Waldrop is the ingenue daughter of the old professor (Mr. Bacon).

A Child Dancer

Nothing more wonderful than the dance of little Reyna Belasco, given as a specialty in "The Corner Grocery" last week, can possibly be imagined. Leaving out of the question the child's natural grace and agility and looking at the dance as a test of endurance it was a marvelous feat. The tiny tot executed every evolution of her solo—which was the real Southern coon dance—with perfect precision. She left out not one step of the complicated solo. Then, when one would have fancied she would have been ready to drop with fatigue, little Reyna came back and did a pretty skirt dance.

The critics of Oregon and Washington pronounce Florence Roberts' "Zaza" a wonderful creation, excelling that of Mrs. Leslie Carter.

A better cast than that we originally saw in "The Christian" will interpret that play here shortly. E. J. Morgan and Elsie Leslie will have the leading roles.

Harry Wood Brown, the local baritone, is now on the Orpheum Circuit, and will shortly be here with four Casino beauties in the Flirtation Quintet.

"Quincy Adams Sawyer" has been staged. It makes a play of the "Way Down East" order.

The Hoyt Farces

When Charles H. Hoyt wrote his plays they were very timely and clever take-offs on passing follies. They were something new then, and it is no wonder they were popular. They still draw, after a fashion, but they are no longer timely. New fads and follies have taken the place of those that gave Hoyt his motif. If "A Hole in the Ground" and "A Brass Monkey" were to be produced now I wonder if they would arouse any mirth? Even "A Contented Woman" seems to have had its day. French farces have spoiled the modern appetite for anything less highly spiced.

Attractions Next Week

Fischer's burlesque theatre has come to stay. "The French Maid" will be given for a third week in response to the demand, new songs being introduced. The company is now rehearsing a delightful musical burlesque, "Little Christopher," which had a run of over two years in London, a year in New York city, and was presented with great success throughout the country. Reserved seats can be secured at Fischer's two weeks in advance at the popular prices of twenty-five and fifty cents, twenty-five cents to any part of the theatre at the matinee performances and fifteen cents for children at the matinees.

Eva Mudge, one of the swiftest lightning-change artists that ever tripped across a stage, has made a hit at the Orpheum this week in her songs and will probably duplicate her success next week. There will be a number of star acts beginning tomorrow afternoon, Cinquevalli, the greatest juggler in the world, being the chief constellation. Even Kara's fame pales before that of Cinquevalli, and the Agousts are but novices beside him. Les Troubadors Toulousians come to this country for the first time and will sing the "Tannhauser" march, a waltz by Strauss, and the finale from "Faust." The Dancing Dawsons execute fourteen distinct styles of dancing in eleven minutes. Mae Dawson is said to be the most original child dancer before the public. "The Six Blackbirds," a colored group, will present their absurdity, "The Golf Links."

George Ober's farewell week at the Grand will close one of the most successful engagements ever known at this theatre. The play for his last week will be George H. Broadhurst's latest and best comedy entitled "The House that Jack Built," which one of the Eastern papers says "makes disgruntled family men forget the price of coal and smooths out the care wrinkles of those who are on the wrong side of the stock market." The play is crammed with diverting complications, laughable, exciting even, from beginning to end. Mr. Broadhurst has written many amusing plays, including "What Happened to Jones," "Why Smith Left Home," "The Wrong Mr. Wright," etc., but "The House That Jack Built" is considered superior to all his previous efforts. Mr. Ober will be seen in the part of Willie Slab, the paper hanger, and the balance of the cast will be portrayed by the clever people of the stock company.

After "Arizona," which goes another week at the Columbia, will come Blanche Walsh in "La Madeleine," Harry Dam's latest play.

"The Serenade" is one of the biggest successes the Tivoli has ever known. Its run will likely be a long one.

"At the White Horse Tavern" will be succeeded at the Alcazar by Madeline Lucette Ryley's charming comedy, "A Coat of Many Colors," its first stock presentation in this city. The new play by Mrs. Coleman and Mr. Bryant is rapidly nearing its finish and will soon be produced.

The Central will have "Oliver Twist" as its bill next week, with Georgie Cooper in the name part.

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought or other fads. Instruction private, not classes. We solicit investigation.

MUSIC

The Nevada Concert

When Emma Nevada was here two years ago, the sensation of her concerts was the 'cellist, Louis Blumenberg, whose hit overshadowed that of the star. This year it is again a 'cellist who carries away the honors—Pablo Casals. He appears to be a mere youth, but then genius is never reckoned by years. Casals brings the most beautiful tone from his instrument, resonant, deep, mellow. His pianissimo, as shown in the encore to his first number, is perfect. He closes his eyes when he plays as if he would be alone with is music, shutting out all sight of what might prove distracting. Daniel Maquarre, the flutist, like the 'cellist a mere boy in appearance, also proved himself an artist. His tone is clear yet delicate and he excels in the finer passages. Leon Moreau, who is an admirable technical player, had the difficult task on Monday night of acting as accompanist owing to the indisposition of M. Lorangue, to add to his duty as soloist. The success of the "support" by no means diminished in fervor the welcome accorded Madame Nevada. She was warmly greeted and sang all the best things in her repertory, again and again returning to please with another selection in response to the applause. She gave the numbers that were on the program, from Delibes, David, Gounod and Del Acqua, and several others including Schubert's "Ave Marie," "The Old Kentucky Home" and "Annie Laurie." Nevada's voice is now like the building so completely modernized that the original structure is lost sight of under the mass of improvements. Her recital is a lesson of which vocal students should not fail to take advantage, her staccato and trills being the perfection of colorature work. There will be a matinee concert today at which Nevada, Casals, Moreau and Maquarre will all appear.

Noah Brandt's Gifted Little Pupil

There is no doubt about the talent of little Aileen McCabe, the fourteen year old girl who made her debut as a violinist on Tuesday night. She handles her instrument with ease and absolute confidence. Her bowing is graceful, her tone strong, full and true. In her short life she has certainly accomplished wonders in overcoming difficulties that many a veteran still considers prodigious. Little Aileen played many numbers, embracing all styles of composition. Her interpretation of the andante tranquillo movement of De Beriot's seventh concerto was remarkable in depth of thought and expression. The Wieniawski "Legende" was rendered with surprising precision and breadth of tone for one so young. No less interesting than her playing was her exhibition of musical ear tests. She gave any tone called for with true pitch, giving names instantly of the notes of any chord, no matter what the combination, and any tone struck on the piano, with her back turned to the instrument.

Sembrich, Suzanne Adams, Emma Eames, Gadski and Mrs. Pat Campbell were among the patronesses at Fritzi Scheff's recent song recital at the Waldorf-Astoria in connection with Mr. Heathe Gregory.

A delightful program was rendered at Grace M. E. church last week in which Professor and Madame Beringer took part. Professor Beringer's numbers were: Nocturne, G minor (Joseph Beringer); Prelude, op. 30 (Ed. Grieg), and a duet from "La Traviata," played with his pupil, Mr. W. Fletcher Husband. Madame Beringer sang "Still wie die Nacht" (Bohm) and "The Minstrel's Song, a charming composition by Joseph Beringer.

Several advanced pupils of vocal instructor Joseph Greven are preparing for a series of operatic concerts, the first of which will take place at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s hall on the eighth of April. Over fifteen students will sing and act different operatic selections in costume. Some of these are already well-known favorites; others, so Mr. Greven believes, will favorably surprise the audience at their first appearance.

Denis O'Sullivan will be here in the late fall to fill a starring engagement at the Grand Opera House.

Francis Stuart is having great success as a teacher in New York, and also in placing his pupils in good positions. One of his pupils is engaged for the Covent Garden opera season, and three are with "Florodora."

On Tuesday evening, April first, will be given at the Alhambra theatre, a production of "The Bohemian Girl," by St. Dominic's juvenile choir and Choral Union, combined with an elaborate minstrel performance by St. Dominic's junior Christy minstrels. The affair is to obtain funds for the exterior painting and interior decoration of St. Dominic's church.

August Schleicher will leave for Europe about the fifteenth of next month. Before he goes he will stage "Patience" and incidentally play Bunthorne for the benefit of St. Patrick's church. Last night the San Francisco Operatic Society gave a musical medley, "La Fiesta," one of the numbers being a composition by Mr. Schleicher, "Flor de l' Oro," a double quintet.

Mrs. Gilbert Whitaker entertained the Juvenile Vocal club at the Hotel Repelier last Saturday afternoon, in the name of her little daughters, Isabel, Fannie and Elenor. A very entertaining program was rendered by the little singers, who had been trained by Madame Roeckel.

Miss Maude Fay will leave tomorrow for New York en route to Dresden, where she will study under Madame Sembrich.

Coming of a Great Contralto

Much interest is being taken by local singers in the recitals to be given next week by Mrs. Katherine Fisk, the famous American contralto, in Sherman, Clay & Co. hall. With the exception of the elder Trebelli, and Madame Scalchi, no great contralto has been heard here in concert for many years. The true contralto voice is rare. Mrs. Fisk's programs are all interesting. On Tuesday evening she will sing three arias from Saint-Saens' "Samson et Delilah," Nevin's "Oh that We Two were Maying," and works by Secchi, Brahms, Schubert, Hollaender, Lalo, Chaminade, Fontenailles, Chadwick, Gaynor, and Thomas, with "The Gardner and the Rose," by Emil A. Bruguiere of this city. On Thursday afternoon Beethoven's "In Questa Tomba," two Schumann songs, Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?", two Chadwick folk songs, and Dr. Arne's "The Lass with the Delicate Air" will be among the selections. Beethoven's "Creation Hymn" and five Biblical songs by Dvorak will be features of Friday evening's program. Seats are now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s; prices, seventy-five cents, one dollar, and one dollar and a half. On Thursday night Mrs. Fisk will sing at the Unitarian church, Oakland.

Rialto Gossip from Gotham

A San Franciscan just returned from New York gives out the following bits of news: Melville Ellis, erstwhile friend and mentor of the Duke of Manchester, is in "The Toreador" chorus. Virginia Earle has made the hit of her life as the highbred Englishwoman in "Florodora." Seabrooke, who is now doing the comedian's role in that piece, has introduced business that has made the whole thing new. His work is original and very clever. To see "Du Barry" one has to buy seats six weeks in advance and then it is hard to get them. Louis Morgenstern is high in authority under Al Hayman but is anxious to return here. Gracie Orr, daughter of "our" Annie Meyers, is a favorite at the Casino with Frank Daniels, but the musical comedy "Miss Simplicity" is a frost. One of the popular comedians on Broadway is June McCree who until recently was popular in San Francisco dives. He is in the "Hall of Fame" cast with Louis Harrison of the old California stock company of Maybelle Gillman, a Mills' College graduate. Grace von Studdiford, the St. Louis soprano who was at the Orpheum a few months ago, is the prima donna of the Bostonians and admittedly the best that was ever with that degenerate company. The Bostonians are playing "Maid Marian," a sort of sequel to "Robin Hood," and one of the most tiresome operas ever written.

Stage Failures

Maurice Bernhardt's play, "Nini L'Assomeur," which failed so dismally as a tragedy that his mother is reported to have collapsed on the night of its production, is having a great success as a travesty. It is one of those affairs in which murders and suicides are three deep in every act, and since the turn of the tide some of the astute critics are claiming that they knew all the time that it was not meant to be taken seriously. This is not the first time, by any means, that a failure of one kind has meant success of another, but perhaps the best example of that kind of somersaluting was "The Black Crook,' which was a dismal failure in Boston as a melodrama; moved to New York, with plot subordinated to ballet and scenic effects, it made an enormous success. Maurice Bernhardt does not mean to be discouraged, for he is busy with a dramatization of Sienkiewicsz' "With Fire and Sword," and is also trying his hand on an attempt at a Wild West play to bear the extremely American title of "Cowboy."

LETTERS

"The Imitator"

The trend of modern society has never been more cleverly satirized than in "The Imitator," the novel which first appeared as a serial in the St. Louis Mirror and which has since been issued in book form by William Marion Reedy. The New York and Newport swim is faithfully pictured, with all its faults and follies laid bare. The name of the author of "The Imitator" is not given, but I presume he is of the masculine gender. No woman could so well probe the heart of things as is done in this book. Orson Vane, the hero, is no fanciful creation. He is a real man. In the opening chapter we see him, a bored, blase man of clubs, forced to epigrammatic cynicism as he whiles away the weary hours in company with a friend of quite opposite tendencies. He becomes interested in a young girl, casually interested, that is, for it is not until long after that the girl comes directly into his life. Orson Vane sees nothing in life worth living. He is "cursed with thought of his own futility." As he expresses it, "I have done nothing at all; I merely am." Though Vane has dabbled not unsuccessfully in many arts his labors always end in the same way—the recognition of his futility. He feels that at best he can never be but an imitator. "Neither scientist nor scholar has yet shown the way to one man's understanding of another's soul." However, Orson meets the man who will give him the understanding of the human soul that he craves. This is Professor Vanlief, the savant, father of the young girl who is later to be Vane's guiding star. Vanlief has invented a mirror that, instead of taking ordinary impressions, is a medium for the transmission of human souls. He lends the mirror to the bored, blase man of clubs, and the boredom is chased away as if by magic. He changes souls—without the knowledge of those he is robbing, of course—with Reginald Hart, Clarence Spalding-Wentworth and Arthur Wantage. These names form but thin disguises for a much-written-of cotillon leader of the Newport set, a society novelist and a famous actor. Vane, in their bodies, causes them all to do even more fantastic things than they had yet accomplished to give the newspapers food for talk. As Reggie Hart he dances in feminine attire and poses in tights; as Spalding-Wentworth, he becomes a great golfer; as Wantage, he adds laurels to the actor's own wreath, runs bills he will not pay and drives his faithful valet to drink. How he is finally rescued from the thralldom of the fascinating mirror, by the unintended sacrifice of his former friend's life, is told in a very startling chapter. The love of Jeannette Vanlief comes to Orson Vane as a rejuvenator and in the finale of the novel we find him on the threshold of true happiness. This is but a skeleton of what is a work of fine conception and careful execution. The plot is unusual, the dialogue Pinero-like in its brilliancy. Some of the thoughts are well worth culling:

"Nothing is so delightful as to imitate others; yet to be mistaken for them is always dreadful."

"Whenever I hear that a person is clever I am sure he will never amount to much. There is only one word that approaches it in deadly significance. That is 'rising.'"

"We touch hands every day, but our souls are hidden in a veil that has not been passed since God made the universe."

"When a man is no longer dunned his credit is either too good or too bad; or else his social position is declining."

"I have always thought the clever thing for Monte Cristo to have done was to lose the world; to hide it where nobody could find it again."

"Some people write to live, and some live to write, and the worse class of all are merely dying to write."

—Louis A. Robertson.

New Idea in Cheap Books

A new departure in the manner of publication is to be tried in London, and if it is successful it will mark the lowest notch yet made in the cost of book production. The idea is of Howard Whitford Bell, who proposes to issue what he designates as a "Unit Library," the cost of his products to be regulated by the number of pages they contain, at the rate of one shilling and two pence for each twenty-five pages, and one penny additional for the paper cover. If the work is done in any acceptable style, and the paper is fairly good, there is no reason on the surface why there should not be a demand for the pamphlets. There are a good many speeches, arguments,

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff.
vs.
William Henry Weston, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Feminine Voice: Is that you, Mr. Ganderson? Yes, this is Giddy. Did you say lunch? Oh, yes, I'll be there in ten minutes. But my gloves are full of holes. While you are waiting, why not stop in and buy me a pair—sixes, gray Suede are what will suit me. Au revoir.

BY POST.

Dear, dear Mr. Ganderson: How utterly sweet of you. When the braid of my gown tore last evening and you pinned it up for me I had no idea you would notice that I was not wearing a silk petticoat. How dear of you to send me this elegant thing. I am only wondering how my old tailor suit will go with this rose-colored beauty?

Very sincerely and gratefully,

Feminine Voice: Oh, is that you, Charlie? Yes, I'll be ready in a moment. You are the nicest man I know. A hundred dollar tailor suit! You are too generous! All I need now is a spring hat and some patent leather shoes. My stockings are not silk, but one can't expect everything in this world. By-by, dear.

BY MESSENGER.

Will be with you in half an hour. The silk stockings are lovely; so's the hat. How would it look with two jeweled hatpins in it?

OVERHEARD.

Feminine Voice: Just one—it hurts my neck to lean over. What a pity I'm so tall—now if I were shorter—well, yes, you can reach me all right now. Oh, oh, oh! What lovely diamonds! Yes, they just match those elegant silk stockings. My sisters will be horribly jealous. Now, I'll give you a big kiss all for yourself.

IN THE COURTROOM.

Male Voice: I swear, your Honor and gentlemen of the jury, that my sole desire was to give pleasure. I had no idea whatever of courtship or marriage.

Feminine Voice: I liked him better than any man I had ever met. I picked him out for my husband. My sole idea was to be honest and honorable. It was the modern woman's wooing. He—he—(bursts into tears).

Jury: (after deliberating): We find the defendant guilty of breach of promise, and award the plaintiff damages to the following amount:

One kiss (the first) at	$ 5 00
Six kisses, at $2.50	15 00
Ten kisses at $1	10 00
Fifty kisses at 25 cents	12 50
Total	$42 50

But we recommend the return to defendant of various articles of wearing apparel, jeweled garters, rings, diamond necklace, interest in one corner grocery, one automobile and sundry articles of more or less value.

OUR OPINION

Rudeness and Wealth

Mrs. Astor having remarked that without a college education no man can be a gentleman, the newspapers seized the statement as a pretext for a discussion of the question as to whether a college education is an essential constituent in the make-up of a gentleman. The sentiment is so absurd and its absurdity so easily demonstrated by citing notable instances of self-made men who are distinguished for their gentlemanly qualities that no person of average intelligence should care to give it a serious thought. Coming from Mrs. Astor, however, it is of some significance. She is a leader in a social set which is composed of people of enormous wealth. They pride themselves on their exclusiveness, but they have attained their luxurious isolation solely by their riches. And that circumstance is not pleasant to ponder. If they could boast a proud ancestry they would be satisfied, for it is a tradition of great antiquity that the aristocracy have certain rights which the common herd are bound to respect, and certain claims to distinction which command the envy of the polloi. But mere vulgar wealth has always excited sneers, and even those possessed of it and nothing else are not quite sure that they have reason to be proud. Therefore it is that Mrs. Astor proclaims a college education as the open sesame to her Holy of Holies. She hopes to disparage wealth and put a premium on culture. She has made a concession to brains. But it was foolish for her to intimate that the men in her set are all gentlemen. Even a college education does not always subdue and repress a man's own instincts. Indeed, it is impossible to refine a bounder who has great wealth, for riches breed arrogance, and that is what the bounder feeds on. The Vanderbilts are of the Astor social push, and it was a Vanderbilt that sidetracked a passenger train in the snow a few weeks ago so that he could keep a social engagement in New York. Evidently a college education failed to improve his manners. The most conspicuous bounder in the world today is an Astor and his Christian names are William Waldorf. If Mrs. Astor hopes to rid her set of the uncultured rich she is doomed to disappointment. None but the rich can afford to move in her circle, and human nature is so constituted that it is extremely difficult to possess great wealth, and a solicitude for the feelings of others. The rich sometimes affect a solicitude for less fortunate mortals, and then their manner becomes of a patronizing nature. Rudeness and wealth go hand in hand, and even a college education cannot rupture the intimacy.

The City Beautiful

The consensus of opinion in San Francisco today is that the city was never so prosperous and never blessed with brighter prospects. Such is not only the consensus of opinion in San Francisco but it is the belief of the so-called captains of industry all over the country. They are looking with greedy eyes in this direction. On all sides we hear that San Francisco is at the gateway of the rich trade of the Orient, that the vast commerce of the Pacific is coming our way, and that our population is increasing with astonishing rapidity. And no observant person doubts that such are the facts. It is also a fact that the interior of the State is in an exceptionally prosperous condition, and if we had no other evidence the simple circumstance that vacant houses are rarer than ever before in the history of the city should be sufficient to convince the sceptical that the metropolis of the Pacific has awakened from her lethargy. San Francisco will grow rapidly in the next ten years and now is the time to provide for the future. If it be already apparent that Third street is no longer wide enough to accommodate traffic now is the time to widen that thoroughfare. Let us not wait until the value of property has greatly increased. If Golden Gate Park is to be extended to Market street that project should be pushed through without uncessary delay. It is possible for San Francisco to become the most beautiful city on the continent, and it should be the aim of the people to attain that end. We have attractions that are possessed by no other large city in America, and we can enhance them and add to them until their fame arouses the interest of tourists from all over the world. And tourists add considerably to the wealth of the largest and most prosperous cities in the world. But to beautify this city, and avail ourselves of present conditions with a view to the future the people must be imbued with a progressive spirit and the city must have a progressive municipal government.

Society at a Monkey's Funeral

The silly and sickening sentimentality of idiotic women has done more mischief in the world than half the things that are accounted crimes. One after another the gracious customs and pretty observances have been abandoned because some misguided female has set the example which is followed by others of her kind until the thing takes on the appearance of a caricature, and people who retain a modicum of common sense are driven to the other extreme out of sheer disgust. One does not mind the follies so much when they affect only the idiots and their set. They may wear their clothes hind side fore or perch upon thrones of agricultural implements, or take the pig for a ride in the automobile, and still not drive the rest of the world to abandoning raiment or refusing to patronize street cars. But there are some customs which have a degree of sacredness about their observance, and common decency demands that these be not dragged through the mire for the sake of affording novelty to fools. One would think that the Christmas tree might be left to the children and not degraded by being decorated for dogs. That bit of profanation was about dying out, but it will probably receive a new fillip since it has the royal sanction of the Queen of Servia. New York society last week expended its energies in a monkey's funeral, where the coffin of the little beast was buried in flowers, and more tears were shed than would have fallen over a child, while the virtues and beauties of the animal were extolled at length in the papers. In the middle of winter, in the frozen East, it would seem as though there would be hardship and poverty enough amongst human beings to absorb the attention of those in better condition. When infants are buried in plain boxes, with never a flower and scarcely a tear, and their little bodies laid away in the Potter's Field, with nothing to mark their graves, it ought to suggest itself to the more fortunate, merely as a matter of good taste, not to make ostentatious display over the death of a monkey. This sort of thing goes nearer to making anarchists than all the howlings of professional anarchists over the differences in income, or anything else that they can trump up. The spectacle of a society woman weeping over the flower-decked coffin of her monkey is a rather realistic establishment of the Darwinian theory of the origin of species.

Growth of a Great Crime

Dr. George J. Engelmann has written a pamphlet which should attract attention and which should become the subject of serious discussion. Dr. Engelmann is at the head of the Boston Obstetrical Society, and his pamphlet was written to call attention to the fact that notwithstanding the advance in obstetrical science, the birth rate in this country is decreasing almost as alarmingly as it is in France. He has made a thorough investigation of the subject, and he declares that his figures show the passing away of the native American. We are recruiting our population from the more fecund European people. He attributes this going down of the birth rate to such powerful factors in our civilization as "financial aspiration, the craving for luxury and social dissipation." It does not require the most careful observation or the deepest scrutiny to be convinced that the alarm of Dr. Engelmann is well founded. Childbearing has been unfashionable for a long time, and as the Rev. Dr. Dike has said, "Many of the families which are best fitted for the rearing of children, so far as pecuniary means and social opportunity are concerned, are deliberately choosing to be unfruitful." Dr. Engelmann's discussion should be interesting to those that approve the theory that maternity is against the interest of woman's health. This learned scientist declares that exhaustion and premature decrepitude are the results of avoidance of maternity. He says moreover: "There is no question as to the baneful sentiment which is gradually developing among young people that bearing and rearing children, 'belongs to low life and is degrading.' which now and then becomes evident in aspersions cast upon those with large families, implying their life to be vulgar and sensual." The pamphleteer has sounded a note of alarm which should not be permitted to fade away.

The Coming Liliputian

It is predicted that the Coming Man of the Twentieth Century will be physically a complete wreck, decrepit, wizened and not fully developed. This lamentable condition is to be the result partly of the modern craze for ultra-athleticism, and partly of the unhealthful methods of living consequently upon the rush and competition of this ruthlessly busy age. There is no doubt that athletics are being carried to ruinous extremes by the proverbially immoderate modern man. The average man who is intent upon keeping himself "in good condition," is wearing away much useful tissue by his efforts to excel in some branch of sport. The scorching cyclist with his humped back and distorted countenance is playing no greater havoc with his system than the record seekers in the tennis court, in the row-boat and in the gymnasium. But the modern craze for open-air exercises, which threatens to produce a race of stunted male pigmies, is accomplishing much good for the opposite sex. If the Coming Man is destined to be a shrunken wreck, there is a strong probability of a race of Amazons being developed. The average woman does not carry her athleticism to extremes. She does not play golf and tennis until every muscle is tired and her heart is beating like a trip-hammer. She plays for pleasure, and not for "training." She doesn't try to perfect her wind by beating the amateur record on the mile track. She swims with the old-fashioned breast stroke and doesn't get out of breath. Her methods are not disastrous.

Truth about Field

The recent Mirror pamphlet, "The Eugene Field Myth," by William Marion Reedy, is apt to raise as much of a tempest as the Henley-Stevenson controversy. Mr. Reedy is not afraid to express his opinions in vigorous language, and it incidentally happens that he is expressing the opinions of a good many other people who have not his facilities for reaching the public ear, but who are none the less independent thinkers. Mr. Redy's subtitle, "Being a Protest against the Silly, Sentimental Apotheosis of a Man and Writer," is self-explantory. Ever since the death of Field he has been exalted to a pedestal, and all passers have been called upon to bow their heads in worship. Because of a few good poems for children, or rather, about children, Field has been set up as a sort of apostle and saint, and every city of any size has had a school named after him. Children are required to learn his verses, and after the idiotic manner of the modern educational course there are "Eugene Field Days" set apart in the school rooms, where all else gives way to the glorincation of the Chicago writer. Field was like any other journalist obliged to scrape out a living with the point of his pen. He did the thing he found he could do best, and he worked his vein for all it was worth. It makes no particular difference whether he felt all he wrote or any of it. The point is, he made readers feel it, and as long as they do feel it his supremacy is secure. But he did not confine his verses, his writings in general, or his stories to Sunday-school topics, and some of those who are industriously burning incense before the statue they have erected would be shocked to discover that the few samples they have examined are a long way from representing the mass. Field, as a man, was not the gentle and childlike innocent but a rather unscrupulous and cold-blooded egotist. One cannot read the fulsome biographies and reminiscences of his admirers without wondering whether they really enjoyed the manner in which he used them and imposed on them, or whether they did not endure the kicks and pricks with an eye single to the making of these same biographies later on. Since "literature" has to be taught in the kindergarten, and the teaching of literature includes a turning over of lives as well as letters, it behooves biographers to fit their recollections to the capacity of the school library, or the juvenile department of the public libraries, since these are large purchasers. There are many phases of life which are not fit for the immature school children, and these must be either omitted or distorted, and the result is chaos. Sooner or later, these milky impressions are disturbed and upset, and the confectionery cupids and angels stand out revealed in all their nakedness. Nothing is gained in the long run by the misrepresentation. There is no especial reason why a eulogistic biography should be turned out from the press the day after a man, writer or otherwise, has shuffled off this mortal coil. There is no reason why the thrifty "Boswell" should be in such a hurry to coin his penny, and so far from doing the dead any honor, these attempts at idealizing mortal men with mortal failings have always worked injury. There is something ghoulish in the way that every one who ever "passed the time of day" with Stevenson or Tennyson, or any other one whose head has stood above the crowd, has turned his opportunities to advantage in a magazine article, if it could not be expanded to a book. Stevenson was so belauded and exalted and written around and about, that after the first shock or surprise at the audacity, one could but rejoice that Henley's so-called "attack" reminded us that he was, after all, a man. Mr. Reedy's pamphlet will clip the feathers of the Field wings, and make it possible for people to realize that when he was here on earth he did some very prosaic walking, with his feet to the earth, instead of flying over the heads of common mortals.

The Saunterer

The "Colonel" Talks

Dan Burns has been talking again. The Colonel is afflicted with the fatal gift of gab. Every time the Colonel returns from his Mexican mine he opes his mouth in the presence of an interviewer, and says things which should have been left unsaid. But the Colonel is a wonderfully successful Bluff, and therefore he should command some measure of admiration, for success in almost any field of endeavor bespeaks either talent or perseverance. The Colonel's latest is that he intends to give battle to Phil Crimmins but that he has had no quarrel with William F. Herrin. It was unnecessary for him to affirm his friendship for Mr. Herrin. I stated last week that without Mr. Herrin's friendship he would be a "dead one" politically, and I know that he has sense enough to be aware of that fact.

Good Fellow but Poor Boss

Indeed, without Mr. Herrin's friendship, Colonel Burns with his Mexican mine if it were ten times its value could not afford to engage in a battle even with little Phil Crimmins. And Crimmins is far from being a Napoleon. But he has some following and he enjoys the loyalty of some of the district politicians, and Burns has no support except that which comes to him through his connection with people whose influence in State politics is generally recognized. Crimmins has no Mexican mine but he is a factor in State and municipal politics. If Burns became as poor as Crimmins tomorrow, the probability is that even Ned Conroy would fail to do him reverence. The Colonel is perhaps, a good fellow, but as a political boss he is a mistake. He demonstrated that when he insured the defeat of Estee by telling an interviewer that he—not the Republican State convention—intended to give poor Maurice M. the nomination for Governor.

Back to the Mines

And now he is being interviewed in the papers in a way that threatens to play havoc with the chances of Henry T. Gage. Yet he has before him the fate of poor Asa R. Wells who took the public into his confidence and exposed the secrets of the Republican machine. It is easy to deceive the public. The public is anxious to be deceived. No political boss can afford to be candid with the dear people. Yet Colonel Burns yells through a megaphone that Henry T. Gage is a railroad candidate. Gage's friends ought to gag the Colonel. If that is an impossible feat they should send him back to his Mexicane mine until the campaign is over. He has alienated the most powerful Republican papers in the State, a circumstance which alone should suffice to force the conviction of his incompetency as a Boss, and yet some wise men are taking him seriously. Surely, as a Bluff he is without a peer.

Engraved Wedding Announcements and Invitations

ROBERTSON, 126 Post Street San Francisco

Buck's Winning Way

Whenever I recall the defeat of Estee by Burns I am reminded of the methods of Chris Buckley which were successful in this city for many years. When Buckley decided to nominate a man for office he instructed him to start out and proclaim his independence of boss rule, through the highways and byways.

"Tell everybody," Buckley would say, "that you're going to break the slate. Call me a — — —, and declare that you wouldn't have anything to do with such a — — — —."

Buckley knew that that was the sort of talk that won the dear people who like to believe that they run the government. But Colonel Burns prefers to impress the multitude with the knowledge that he is the great Mogul who dictates nominations. And he is giving aid to the enemies of Governor Gage in a way that should alarm the latter's friends.

The Co-Respondent Flutters into Town

That gay and sprightly little widow who has fascinated so many gilded cuckoos and who was the disturbing factor in the Cowles' household has fluttered into town. It's only the flutter of a few weeks, however, for she has taken pains to tell her friends that she can only "visit" a few days. Which means that she will be on her way eastward as soon as the storm has passed over the Cowles' divided hearth. She has been living in splendid style since her arrival and each day gaily gowns herself in a new French creation with the laughing explanation that she has whole trunks full of them. Those who know say she got them on the trip she made to Paris with the shrewd asphalt speculator just prior to his marriage with the well-known local society girl who went to New York to live. Through all the heart raptures and heart burnings of his recent domestic experience he seems to have provided liberally for the little widow for her gowns seem to be literally stuffed with hundred-dollar bills. As every one knows she is not the one to show them, much less to spend them, unless she has bunches of them laid away for safe keeping. She is credited with being the shrewdest bit of femininity that ever angled after a fatuous capitalist's bank account. I don't know how many single men she has led to financial slaughter but I know of seven families that she has disrupted with her wiles.

Heartaches Follow Her Footsteps

Capricious Fate seems to have selected both her and her sisters for just such careers. Her sister, though, has not coquetted over such an extended territory but has contented herself with several Californian capitalists. But the little widow belongs to the Du Barrys and is only happy when she commands half a dozen fortunes. When I saw her last in New York she was living at the Hotel Netherlands. "California's too small for me," she said, "I'm never going back there." Then she added, naively, "One can make such good and such influential friends here. Why, I was given a Wall street tip the other day and I cleaned up—why, just thousands, yes, thousands." And she showed two one thousand dollar bills as evidence of her success. But it was less than a fortnight after that she decided to come out here till the divorce suit was settled. She was the co-respondent and it wouldn't have looked well for her to have been dragged into such a mess from her sumptuous apartments in a fashionable hotel. Since her arrival here in her stunning gowns she has been creating all sorts of hopes, fears, tremors and heartaches in the bosoms of the gay club men young, old, but always rich, that she used to smile on. Gossip has it that her ex-husband is soon to marry again.

Troubles of the Telegraph Man

Manager George Putnam who looks after the country newspaper service here for the Scripps-McRae company had a number of funny experiences during the recent big storm. Right after the first big blow laid low the lines and cut off communication with the outside world he received a vigorous "kick" by mail because he had not telegraphed the regular day's news to a certain rural paper. "But the wires were down and the big storm turned everything topsey turvey," he wrote in explanation. What was his astonishment to receive the following by return mail: "If the storm was such a rouser and was turning everything topsey-turvey it must have been a big thing in a news way and that's all the more reason you should have wired us a report of it."

Things that Won't Go by Wire

He went down to the telegraph office to see if the company didn't have some private copyrighted way of treating such denseness. The operator laughed. "You can't do anything with such cases," he explained, "we have them right along and the only way to treat them is to give them all the line they want and let them play with it till they're exhausted. See this message," and he picked up one on his desk. "It's a case of the same kind. The man came in here during the big storm and wanted to telegraph twenty-five dollars to Chicago to pay a bill. 'You can't telegraph it today,' I explained, 'the wires are down.' What do you think he did? Went to the desk and wrote out this message: 'Can't telegraph you the money till the storm is over, and wires repaired.' "Send that instead,' he said. Of course I took it. What was the use of trying any further to explain the situation to him? But the king-pin of this lot of freaks came in here this morning. He spent half an hour writing out his message. When he brought it to the desk I found it was addressed to an Oakland planing mill and read:

THE STANDARD FOR CHAMPAGNE QUALITY IS

POMMERY & GRENO

THE WORLD OVER

LORD TEMPLE
CIGARS
A Favorite in New York Clubdom
ALL DEALERS

'Send me fifty each of the following mouldings.' Then followed an assortment of scrolls, and queer-looking figures. 'What's this?' I asked. 'Oh,' he explained, blandly, 'I want the mill company to send me mouldings of those designs.' I called up one of the messenger boys to try and explain things that go over the wire to him and then I went way back and sat down till he was gone."

The Coming of the Hyphen Habit

I wonder if there is any truth in that rumor that a prominent bride of last week proposes to innovate the custom here of the hyphenated name. She is a girl of some independence of character and declares the custom of a woman forfeiting her name and losing her identity by marriage ought to be stopped. Her friends, to whom she has confided her determination to make a stand, admit that the loss of name of the bride is a relic of a barbarous epoch when a woman was a mere appendage, but then—it has the approval of society. "Fig," says the new bride, "I'll put a different stamp on it when I order my new cards." In the East some of the big families with proud names insist on their preservation through the hyphen despite custom's or anybody else's edicts. In Europe double-barreled names are thicker than blackberries in autumn. They have usually a distinguished ring about them which gives them an air of nobility. Sometimes, to be sure, they are alarmingly long; but that, however, is the fault of the country and not of the system. In Hungary is a society whose object is to join names as well as hands. Nowhere in the world is the right of women to their own dear maiden names so universally admitted, and so strictly enforced as in Spain. And now if this San Francisco bride has her way, other hyphens may be bred here to rival and perhaps eclipse those of Goad-Martin-Reilly.

The Other View

There are always two ways of looking at a thing is what the logical mind says, and so, while it is particularly trying to many of our girls to see such a lot of belles chosen to tread the rosy path of Hymen, yet the reverse view shows what an advantage it is to have these girls of such wide experience removed from their way. Yes, but are they? All the world knows how simply irresistible a charming young matron is.

By One that Met Her

A correspondent writes: I read with a great deal of interest last week your paragraph about the death of Madame de Rute, daughter of the Princess Letitia. Bonaparte. I met her in Paris one night a few years ago, and what a wreck I beheld, of the beautiful woman who helped to break down the Empire of France and to build up the kingdom of Italy. She was a second Madame de Stael, with all of the latter's brilliant talents and in addition that rare Napoleonic beauty which enabled Pauline, sister of the great Emperor, to break many hearts. Madame de Rute wrote novels, plays and books of travel, and was a successful editress. Some of France's greatest literary geniuses regarded her as their equal. Fifty years ago kings and statesmen were at her feet, but she preferred literary men. She was the object of one of the many passions of Victor Hugo, and Eugene Sue's novel about her, which you mentioned, was a brilliant story of his love for her. She captivated Rochefort in his youth, and her first husband, Baron de Solins, was an Alsatian Croesus. When she married Rattazi, he was Prime Minister and one of Italy's greatest statesmen. In late years her salon in Paris was the centre of Upper Bohemia, and there one could always meet men of letters, artists and stage people. It was there that I saw her a few years ago, a little old woman, with parchment skin and sunken cheeks. Alas, the beautiful creature whom poets and romancers adored, the woman whom kings and Prime Ministers groveled before, whose Napoleonic features, Duran, the great artist, perpetuated on canvas and Clesinger immortalized in marble, had failed to grow old gracefully.

Gotham's Fashions

New York women, a correspondent writes me, are carrying or wearing their violets tied with a yard of violet-colored cord with tiny cord acorns on the ends. This is the latest fad. Florists send the violets tied this way to their purchasers, and charge five dollars a bunch for them, a bunch about the size of one that costs twenty-five cents here during violet time. Another fad is the bags the women carry to the theatre, suppers and even to balls. They are not very large but are oblong in shape and have a handle. They are made of beads or suede and have quite superseded the soft satin opera bags. The newest pompadour is low in front and with the point on the forehead quite in the centre. New York hairdressers say it is right from Paris.

sojourning in New York are very smart affairs indeed. Rubens always has one or more grand opera people to sing and usually "introduces" some new aspirant whom he charges anything from two hundred and fifty dollars up for the privilege of the introduction. Last week Miss Scovel, a cousin of President Roosevelt, appeared and I am told by a Californian sojourning in New York paid one thousand dollars for the honor, as she received ultra advertisement and all the extras. To be professionally introduced in New York, it appears, costs something and genius unadorned by dollars is not on the managers' eligible list.

The Bachelors of Bush Street

The Holluschickie is the somewhat cryptic name of a house at 722 Bush street where several prominent young men reside. Holluschickie is the Russian word used to designate the bachelor seal. This seal is not a confirmed bachelor or a bachelor from choice but there is a period during which he is compelled by other male seals to keep away from the female of his species. The bachelors of the Holluschickie are Professors Sitchell and Hunt of Berkeley, Temple Smith, Harry Connick, Tom and Roy Pike, Charles Dobey, H. L. Baggerly and Norman Wright. They conduct the house as a sort of a club, but they are not barred from female society nor have they any antipathy for femininity.

The Chaperon. What! engaged to one man and flirting with another?

Miss Devote: It had to be. It's Lent, you see.

The Chaperon: And what connection has that with your action?

Miss D.: Oh, I'm denying myself Willy's kisses. A platonic affair with Cholly is my penance.

Passing the Buck

A young man afflicted with the craze for social distinction disgraced himself the other day by passing a bogus check. Thereupon he was proclaimed a fraud, and those of our social butterflies with whom he had rubbed wings demanded to know by whom he had been sponsored. That astute social leader, Mrs. Monroe Salisbury, declared that he was introduced to her by Mrs. McClung. When Mrs. McClung was interviewed she said that she first met the young man at one of Mrs. Monroe Salisbury's functions. This is surely a case of passing the buck. Somebody has been fibbing. If a young man who has not been properly branded can mingle with the buds at a Salisbury fortnightly, the mothers should be warned. If a white vest and a claw-hammer constitute the cachet of the Salisbury elect let us proclaim that fact to the wide, world.

A concert is to be given on April tenth at Sherman & Clay Hall, the proceeds of which will go to the Benevolent Nurses' Association for an endowed bed in St. Luke's hospital. Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt has the program in charge and some of the artists already secured are Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Friedhofer, Dr. Lawrence H. Hoffmann, Dr. A. Rykert and Harry Samuels. The patronesses are Mrs. H. M. Sherman, Mrs. W. B. Harrington, Mrs. S. N. Walter, Mrs. William Ford Nichols, Mrs. George H. Powers, Mrs. Middleton, Mrs. James Otis, Mrs. Elliott McAllister, Mrs. Charles A. Slack and Mrs. Francis J. Carolan.

An Awful Threat

The church decorations were most elaborate at a swell wedding which took place in Oakland not many weeks ago. The bride was the daughter of a prominent Oakland citizen, and the groom was one of the elite of San Jose. The church decorations were superb, and provoked many "Oh!" and "Ahs!" of admiration, but they have not been paid for. The father of the bride has been told that if he does not pay the bill it will be sent to his son-in-law.

Kirkpatrick's Amendment

During the late municipal campaign a job chaser named Kirkpatrick had a dispute one day with Blinker Murphy over Eugene Schmitz and the Irish vote. Murphy insisted that Schmitz was of German parentage, and that he couldn't get the Irish vote. "Indade he will," cried Kirkpatrick, "I know U'geen an' I know that he's two-thirds Irish an' one-third Tootonic."

Kirkpatrick failed to get a job under Mayor Schmitz and one day, a few weeks ago, he met Murphy again and said:

"You raymimber what I said about Schmitz?"

"Yes," said Murphy, "I remember."

"Well, I wuz wrong," said Kirkpatrick, "he's three-thirds Tootonic."

When Ross was Tenant

The old castle on Telegraph Hill is now the home of a coterie of Bohemians—artists and writers. With its quaint surroundings and picturesque prospect extending across the Golden Gate, the old gray ruin possesses attractions that charm and enthuse. I remember years ago when it was the home of that famous athlete, Duncan Ross, the hero of many a broad-sword contest. Ross was a genial host, and he was fond of the company of newspaper men. One evening, during the period in which Ross occupied the castle, two reporters employed on rival morning newspapers had a quarrel, and they agreed to settle it with bare knuckles in the castle on the hill. Other reporters arranged for the bout, which was set for three A. M. and the news soon spread through journalistic circles. In the wee sma' hours newspaper men began wending their way to the summit of the hill. Ross was on hand to receive them. The castle was all ablaze and at the appointed hour the two scribes appeared in an improvised arena. There were about fifty reporters present. Just as the battle began the police broke in and placed the whole crowd under arrest.

A Lucky Chemist

At the Palace the other day, I ran across Dr. Bockland, the young chemist who made a fortune out of the Lehigh Valley cement beds not long ago. Dr. Bockland was a struggling chemist with no bright prospects when he discovered the merits of those beds in Lehigh Valley. He paid ten thousand dollars for the land and sold it a little later for one hundred thousand. He thought it was a splendid price but the men who bought sold it to Dick Croker of New York for over a quarter of a million. Croker organized a company to manufacture cement and it is now paying ten per cent on five millions. The cement is being used in the construction of the underground railroad in New York. Dr. Bockland is installing a cement plant for W. J. Dingee and Will Henshaw in Napa county and he declares that they have material superior to that used in the manufacture of the Lehigh Valley cement.

The Rough House Senator

Senator Benjamin Ryan Tillman has been in the full glare of the calcium ever since he landed on the eye of his colleague, Senator McLaurin, and upset the peace and dignity of the nation's highest legislative body. That little incident provoked the shedding of a great deal of printers' ink, and served incidentally to expose the ignorance of people all over the country regarding the character and record of the men that make the nation's laws. It was remarked by one editor that nothing short of a disgraceful row could bring Tillman into national prominence. Senator Tillman has figured as one of our most distinguished statesmen for years. He served two terms as Governor of South Carolina, and within a very short time after entering the Senate he commanded the respectful attention of its most brilliant members. At first they regarded him as a mere crank, but they were not long in discovering that he was a rough diamond. And to the chagrin of many he demonstrated that he was a dangerous opponent. He never discusses a question with which he is not familiar, and his reasoning is always sound and clear. He has on more than one occasion passed beyond the bounds of decorum, notably in his early denunciations of Grover Cleveland, but wild and wooly as he is, no one in Washington doubts his honesty. He lost an eye while fighting for the Confederacy and his personal appearance is far from prepossessing. He is tall, gaunt and raw-boned, with a bullet head, and closely cropped black hair. He is as strong as an ox, but in private life he is of the gentlest and kindliest nature.

The most delightfully blended whisky known to the human palate is "Jesse Moore"—the standard for over fifty years.

She Made Husbands Jealous

Ethyl Hager's "Sandwich Man" at the Spreckels bal masque is still a matter of wonderment. "I didn't know any girl had a pocket big enough to put her vanity in," said Mr. Spreckels and every one puts ditto marks under that. For Miss Hager certainly made a comic valentine of herself and thereby red-lettered the ball as something out of the ordinary slow, dull affairs. Her pranks sent some of the women into hysterics for they never guessed her sex and she was dubbed that "horrid fresh man." When the "Sandwich Man" tried to find out whether Helen Taylor "loved the boys" by the good old-fashioned method of tickling the knees, Gus Taylor was furious. Miss Hager never once spoke until unmasking time which kept people off the scent. One man who thought the "Sandwich Man" too familiar with the ladies was heard telling Miss Hager that if she was not a gentleman she should at least remember she was in a gentleman's house. When Miss Hager's identity was revealed Mrs. Spreckels caused much amusement by announcing that several husbands had demanded that that cheeky "Sandwich Man" be requested to keep his hands off their wives. It will be hard for any one else to equal, or even for Miss Hager herself to live up to this success.

Methuen's Carelessness

If the War Department keeps Kitchener in South Africa a little longer, the Boers may take it into their heads to capture him, and then negotiate the release of Cronje. Kitchener must be finding life exceedingly monotonous in South Africa, for his reports are nearly all in the same strain. His latest regret is the capture of Colonel Methuen who was guilty of criminal carelessnss in venturing out among the kopjes with only nineteen hundred men for a bodyguard. The British press declare that the disaster to Methuen's regiment will tend to prolong Boer resistance. A few more reverses of that magnitude may create the impression that such disasters tend to shorten British persistence.

Why They were Shocked

When the Australian liner Ventura was alongside the wharf on Wednesday last among the first of the passengers to leave the ship was a smartly attired woman, with auburn hair, intellectual face and a bull terrier pup lugging her shoreward at the end of a blue silken cord. On the steamer she was known as Mrs. Ricketts. She boarded her at Pago Pago and before the palms and charms of the South Sea isles were two days astern she was counted by the good people of the first cabin as a most delightful and cultured person and those who sat in judgment on her were really "good" for most of the saloon travelers were missionaries and their families. The women sat at table cheek by jowl with the one of the ravishing hair and between times courted her society, while the brats belonging to them gave her no peace at all, so charming and kind did they find her. Before the Ventura reached the wharf Mrs. Ricketts was accorded many an affectionate farewell, each accompanied by a pressing invitation to call and the hope expressed that it would not be the last that would be seen of her. The woman with the auburn tresses and her bull terrier had hardly got their feet on home soil before she was recognized as Cora Graham, queen of the demi-monde and well known in local tenderloin circles. Her erstwhile friends of the Ventura were shocked at the revelation.

Gay Basil Ricketts

No one has a better right to go under the name of Mrs. Ricketts than this same auburn haired woman, for did not Basil Ricketts make her his lawful wife? The last that was heard of this lambent son of Major General Ricketts, U. S. A., he was in New York, where he went after being mustered out of the army at Montauk Point upon the return of the first expedition from Cuba. He was in the thick of the fight at San Juan and there he stopped two Spanish bullets. No matter what else has ever been said about him there is just enough good Hibernian blood in his veins that has always made him ready to stand up to the next man. Ricketts was started out by Princeton and when he came to San Francisco a good billet was found for him with the Hibernia bank. He was given a notarial appointment and his position in life was assured, but the ways of business were too slow for him. He topped off his wildness by the matrimonial venture referred to. He thought it was all right from the point of view he then held of the world, but his people called it a mesalliance and Society was duly shocked.

Artists with Their Hammers

Young Matteo Sandona, the Italian artist, appears to have aroused the envy of his brothers of the brush. Young Sandona has talent, and it has been recognized by two of the best art critics in San Francisco—Mr. J. W. Byrne and Mr. James D. Phelan. Hence the indigdignation of the older artists who thought they had a mortgage on the local field. Their hammers have been swinging violently. Some time ago, Charlie Dickman, who can knock almost as well as he can paint, criticised the youthful Italian quite severely in the Examiner which was rather an indelicate thing for him to do. For months the artists have been visiting Sandona's studio to see his portrait of Miss Doris Jeffrey which is as beautiful and unconventional as herself, and that was the portrait which the committee on art determined should not be exhibited. But Mr. Byrne pleaded and the picture was exhibited, and Thursday evening it attracted groups of admirers.

Now that He's Free

When Edward J. Morgan, the actor, was out here during the Henry Miller engagement, he was made much of by the smart set and it was whispered in stage asides that a society girl was rather more interested in him than the platonics permit. But just as the pros and cons were heatedly discussing the probability of a girl in the ton marrying an actor, the idea was sent a glimmering by the news that Morgan had a wife from whom he was not legally separated. Then the gossips averred that the gentlemanly actor had the habit of looking too long on the absinthe when 'tis green, and could tipple all the weird decoctions of the fin de siecle mixerologists. Presto! society right about faced, and Mr. Morgan found time to study his parts undisturbed by teas and dinners. But now comes the news from Chicago that Mr. Morgan is at last a full-fledged member of the Alimony Club and the divorce proceedings revealed the fact that it was his erstwhile wife and not Edward J. himself who was a slave of the "Green Monster." When he comes here next week Mr. Morgan will probably be handed some warmed over apologies, but it is said the society girl's interest has cooled to indifference.

A Case of Plutomania

Anent my paragraph of last week about Ashton Potter's row with one of the Taylor boys, I am told that both "Gus" and "Will" Taylor are two of the most exclusive young gentlemen in society. Their father is a highly respected foundryman, but a casual observer might take them for sprigs of nobility, especially since their marriage, for they made excellent matches. The Hopkins girls whom they married are most democratic, but the Taylor boys shy at anybody who has less than a million. Snobs? Oh, no—merely a case of plutomania. Mrs. Pope, who was a Miss Taylor, married a man of millions, so they are saying in society that the Taylor luck compares favorably with that of the Wilsons of New York who allied themselves with the Goelets, the Astors and the Vanderbilts.

Greenway's Calves

Artificial calves are to be en regle at the Coronation but if "our" Edward goes over to participate in the ceremonies his limbs will not be padded. Mr. Greenway has a pair of calves that any man might well be proud of and he exhibits them on the slightest provocation. At fancy dress balls Greenway is always on hand with knee-breeches, and his calves are always in evidence. The date of his costume is of no consequence because he always looks like a cross between a court gentleman, a pirate, an Indian, a troubadour, and a Spanish Don. His legs are his fad but not his weakness for they are of the sort that make Horace Platt and Sam Shortridge green with envy. His are the calves of the well bred person. By his calves you know him—Mr. Greenway of Greenway Court, Maryland.

About Garters

For years and years physicians and dress reformers warned women that in wearing the old-fashioned garter—a simple circlet—she was risking life, health and the pursuit of happiness. She was told that it impeded circulation and that it produced sciatica and paralysis. But as Dame Fashion had no fault to find women heeded not the warnings of science. But a short time ago the straight front corset came into vogue and one of the essential devices for keeping it straight is the lengthwise garter attached. And, I am informed that some stays boast attached garters all the way round keeping the corset beautifully straight. But I had no intention of going deep into the mysteries of feminine harness. It is merely my purpose to call attention to the influence of fashion, for the old-style garter which was inveighed against so many years has disappeared. Science could not budge it from milady's leg but the new-fangled corset did the work. And now the doctors say that the lengthwise garter and the round affair are also injurious. They don't impede circulation but they superinduce backache. But who cares about backache?

The Sunflower Candidate

Kansas City is already trying to indicate the ticket for 1904. Now that General Frederick Funston is known to have survived the massacre of his vermiform appendix by the surgeons of his home State, he is being urged by the Sunflower press for high office. The banner of Kansas has been unfurled to the political breeze with the following legend inscribed upon it:

For President—Ted.
For Vice-President—Fred.
Platform—Spread.

It has been said of Kansas that it started to raise hell, and is suffering from over-production.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

Maggie Moore

There is not a little irony in the return of Maggie Moore, San Francisco's stage idol of twenty years ago, with money and jewels and fine clothes. It was heartsore and broken in pocket that she sailed for Australia, the land of her adoption, two years ago, after a streak of hard luck that would have made even Pierpont Morgan throw up his hands had it struck him with relative force. First, the company that she brought with her from the Antipodes was taken down with measles and the tour of the Northwest that had been planned had to be cancelled. She got a booking finally at the California and opened with "The Silence of Dean Maitland." At the end of the week her leading man was frozen so hard that he has not yet thawed out. He was positively worse than the measles. With the years the old favorite of "Struck Oil" had lost much of the lissomeness which was once a rare charm and San Francisco she found had acquired an esthetic view that she could not satisfy. The children of the fathers of her day were unlike their progenitors. But if Maggie Moore did not suit San Franciscans she held as warm a spot in the hearts of the Australians as she used to occupy here and when she went back to them a failure, they took her in their arms and showered upon her a patronage that has enabled her to come back home, and, womanlike, revel in the goodness of her fortune. Maggie Moore was born in San Francisco and her family name is Sullivan. She married J. C. Williamson, who is still remembered here, and, after nearly twenty years, they were divorced. He is still in Australia, and though the Antipodes has been Mrs. Williamson's home the best part of that time she never forgot those of her own blood who are in San Francisco. To them, until misfortune came upon her two years ago, she had ever played the part of a fairy godmother of great goodness.

He Guarded Against a Successor

The will of the late George Bliss, cattle king and millionaire granger, puts a good stout string on what he left his wife. Evidently he had in mind that she is still comely and that there are other men with eyes as good as his for a fine looking woman, when he said that the family residence in Pacific avenue was to be hers only so long as she remained single or until her death. Besides one-third of the cash he had on hand when he went to his account, and a gift of five hundred acres of land in Tulare county, the best she gets is a life interest in the rest of the immense estate. This is said not to cut her one-half so deeply as the way the family residence is tied up. That has been the pride of her life since she became Mrs. Bliss as it was the envy before. Nellie Bliss, now Mrs. "Judge" Sullivan, was the head of the household until her father took unto himself a second wife in the person of Martha Guerin, one of her schoolmates. After that the stepmother ruled. One by one the children left the home nest and married. First went Nellie and then Hattie, who became the wife of George Herrmann. Old man Bliss forbade the latter union and his dislike for the man, while it did not communicate itself to his daughter, continued for her husband to the end. The manner of his bequest to her of a share in the estate shows this. It is to be held in trust for her and her children by Judge Sullivan, but should she cease to be the wife of George Herrmann then the trust shall cease and she shall take complete possession. While the stories are many of Mrs. Bliss's severe attitude toward the children she must be a woman of fine feeling for in the days of her prosperity she has not forgotten school girl friends who have not been as successful as she in match-making. Every week since her marriage she has always had some of them to dinner at "the big house" and many a kindness is said to have gone to them from her hands.

Foote's "Liberty Hall"

There, is perhaps, no host more genial than Billy Foote, late of the Paris Commission. When entertaining under his own roof-tree he fairly glows with hospitality. He tells his guests that the Foote home is "Liberty Hall," and that joy should be unconfined. When Maud Berri was here, Billy Foote gave a reception in her honor at "Liberty Hall." Her father, Fulton Berry, and Foote are old chums and the genial Foote was delighted at the opportunity to honor the talented girl. Fulton Berry was in high spirits. He fairly sizzled with bonhomie and in the early part of the function he started to apologize to his host for being a little too demonstrative.

"Oh, that's all right," said Foote in his most affable manner, "remember you're in Liberty Hall."

Later on when Mr. Berry had drunk a few toasts and was feeling real gay and was spinning some good stories he displayed a reckless disregard of the frailty of the Foote glassware. It was not, however, until he had shattered some table-ware that Foote cautioned him. Thereupon Mr. Berry, with an expression of pained surprise on his face exclaimed, "Why, I thought you said this was Liberty Hall."

Beauty and Wealth

The L. G. Bells have been attracting attention at the Palace hotel. Mrs. Bell is one of the most beautiful women in America, and her young husband has a million or two. I believe the money came out of the Singer Sewing Machine company. Young Bell is quite a high-flyer, and he and his wife are enthusiastic lovers of the turf. The other day Mrs. Bell was presented by her husband with a fifty thousand dollar necklace.

Now He's Hired by the Rich

There is nothing like a good political job which gives prestige and influence, to boom a man's professional business. Before becoming a member of the Police Commission Attorney H. W. Hutton confined his practice to cases involving the interests of men connected with labor organizations. He is the attorney for the Coast Seamen's Union and for years he has been kept busy fighting for the interests of its members against the wealthy and powerful shipping men. But now his legal ability is recognized by the men whom he has hitherto opposed. From the dailies I learn that he is the attorney for George W. McNear in a big suit growing out of a shipping contract.

There is a Baby Buckbee

The Sam Buckbees have a baby and of course it is the dearest little girl that has ever been seen out this way. It was their first visit from the ciconia alba and baby runs a good chance of being spoiled. Baby Buckbee has some very fond grandparents and any number of aunts and uncles. On her papa's side there are Uncle Spencer and another uncle in the East, Aunt Lillie (Mrs. Currie) and Aunt Annie. On her mamma's side are Aunt Fannie (Mrs.. McCreary), Aunt Lizzie (Mrs. Green) and Aunt Van Fleet, with Uncle Henry. As Julia Crocker was the favorite of the family, her little girl will share in her pretty mother's popularity. I have an idea that Mrs. Sam Buckbee will be a model mother, just like her sister-in-law, Mrs. Henry Crocker. The latter is devoted to her children and their nursery is a gem.

The Baby's Ancestors

The Clark Crockers were always regarded as "poor relations" by the Charlie Crocker family, though they lived in a good house and the children were sent to private schools. Though she was never thrown a life-saver by the chiefs of the clan—unless the legacy of ten thousand dollars from her Uncle Charles' estate may be called that—Julia always managed to bob up serenely with the swim and keep afloat with the heaviest swells. Her marriage with Sam Buckbee did not impair her social position, the Buckbees having always been within the boundary lines of the smart set.

A Bit of Repartee

The late Mrs. Clark Crocker, Julia's mother, was really a good-hearted woman but very brusque. A society reporter was sent out to interview her, several years ago, anent one of niece Amy Crocker-Gillig's escapades. The young lady was fumbling her note-book when the maid opened the door. Before the reporter could state her errand, Mrs. Crocker, who happened to be in the hall and evidently mistook the young woman for an agent of some sort, said:

"I wish you people would not ring the front bell, but go round to the side door."

The surprised reporter flushed angrily and then tartly answered:

"We're not so used to side entrances as are some of the Crockers!"

Now She's In

Mrs. George Crocker was one of the guests at Jennie Blair's luncheon to Mrs. Oelrichs and thus the entering wedge was made for Mrs. George to saunter into the local smart set. For though the Reverend Nichols ticketed the George Crockers among the quartet of San Francisco elite, society people out here gave the reverend gentleman's classification the cheerful ha ha. Mrs. George Crocker has always found our smart set stiff as buckram; in fact, they have always held her at icicle length. Even after Mrs. Crocker won a reserved seat among the Gotham mighty, she was refused admittance out here. Just to be contrary San Francisco doesn't always lockstep with New York and this was one of the cases. Mrs. George Crocker had been initiated into and taken all the degrees in the Newport cotrie presided over by Mrs. Fish, Mrs. Belmont and Mrs. Oelrichs, but she had yet to win San Francisco. Charles I had his Hampden and Mrs. Crocker had her Del Monte. For when she summered there last year she found the weather so cool, don't you know, that she went where a warmer reception awaited her. Mrs. Eleanor Martin was the only one who melted into anything like cordiality. Consistency is one jewel that Society never wears —which is the only explanation of its attitude toward Mrs. George Crocker.

How It Was Done

It is said that Mrs. Crocker took it all good-naturedly and with her "never say die" spirit prepared to give us another trial. Not that the San Francisco seal is necessary, but it was a thorn in the social crown that had to be removed even if with kid gloves. And Mrs. Oelrichs' presence here just now did the act, for "Tessie" Oelrichs has fought long hard battles for Mrs. Crocker in New York and she wouldn't miss any tricks in a deal out here. It was simply "love me, love my friend," and Society is meekly obeying.

The Infant Terrible

Do parents ever realize, in their daily conversation within hearing of their children, how, apparently unheeded, their words may be listened to and taken in by the "little pitchers" and later repeated to their possible mortification? A lady well known in our social world, who was noted for being a great talker, had occasion the other day to reprove her six year old son for some sin of commission and in the presence of a number of her friends the boy faced her, saying, "There you go with your eternal jaw, jaw, jaw; clatter, clatter, clatter. You are enough to drive a man crazy!" The mother, though rather taken aback only said, "Ain't he cute?" But her friends knew the boy was simply repeating, parrot like, the words of his father.

Yet He Wondered

Again, comment is frequently made of the prevalence of strong language used by our buds and belles, and here another illustration will fit in nicely. The little daughter of one of our leading families went to spend the day with another child and when her maid came for her in the evening the lady of the house said to her: "Tell Mrs. Blank Minnie has been very good." Whereupon Minnie added, "And I didn't swear, either, did I?" The maid upon her return home repeated the conversation to her mistress whose husband was present, and he looking up from his paper said, "I wonder what the devil makes that child swear so?" To which the mother replied, "I'm damned if I know."

California Club Politics

The most important meeting in the history of the California club is the one to be held next Tuesday, at which the club will decide whether it will incorporate or not and will also elect its officers for the ensuing year. Two tickets are already in the field. The one presented by the nominating committee is headed by Mrs. George Law Smith, with Mrs. Aylett Cotton as first vice-president and Dr. Dorothea Moore for second vice-president. Factional strife in the club is still at a white heat, and the opposition to Mrs. White's policy, embracing some fifty active members, will present another ticket on election day. Though Mrs. White has decided to retire from office she is taking a lively interest in club politics, and it is said that her adherents deterred some of those on the regular ticket from going on the independent ticket by threatening to scratch the names of those that accepted endorsement. But four of them have had the courage to accept. Mrs. White's influence in the club is strong for she was its founder and has done much good work, and it is a significant fact that the only hold-over directors to receive the nomination on the regular ticket were those whose loyalty to Mrs. White has been unquestioned.

A Plot Scented

The names on the second ticket have not yet been anounced, but it is understood that Mrs. John Jay Scoville, one of the founders of the club, and a woman of much dignity, and conspicuous for her fair-mindedness, is the nominee for the presidency and Mrs. C. Mason Kinne, who is a parliamentarian of no mean order, is the nominee for first vice-president. The second ticket endorses Dr. Moore for second vice-president, and, so the story of the anti-White element goes, might have endorsed Mrs. George Law Smith, the regular candidate for president, had not a little suspicion been aroused. The lady politicians are most suspicious of one another, and they can scent jobs that even a Chris Buckley never had the ingenuity to plan. When the nominating committee, after giving a complimentary vote to Mrs. White, finally settled on Mrs. George Law Smith as a candidate, there was surprise among the independents. Then they put their heads together and tried to figure it out. And the conclusion they came to was that an effort was being made to lead them into a trap. "If we endorse Mrs. Smith," they declared, "and that is evidently what they want us to do, then they'll scratch her and vote for Mrs. White." And yet Mrs. White has declared positively that she doesn't want the job. But lady politicians take no chances with one another. Now it is to be a test of popularity between Mrs. Scoville and Mrs. Smith with the odds, I am assured, on Mrs. Scoville.

Accused of Log-Rolling

Where it is all going to end none can predict. Mrs. White's friends say that she is entitled to the everlasting gratitude of the club for all she has done, and that she would give away weight if she even accepted office again, but the other day when she was eulogized at a meeting by Mrs. Sharon, and she, in turn, said nice, complimentary things about Mrs. Sharon, some of the ladies smiled cynically and declared that such log-rolling was in exceedingly bad taste. So there you are.

For over half a century "Jesse Moore" Whisky has held its supremacy as the best, purest and most palatable.

Some of the Gossip

I earnestly hope that the dear women will bury the hatchet after election, for the bitterness that has been engendered in the club is of a character that portends much ill-natured bickering. I have tried to be impartial in my accounts of the progress of the battle and I believe I have presented both sides, but not to the satisfaction evidently of either. For femininity is unreasonable. Each of the factions sees justice only in its own cause. In a communication received today I am told that the affairs of the club have been divulged by a member of the Board of Directors and that in consequence there is talk of social ostracism. By friends of Mrs. White I am assured that there is no strength to the opposition and that Mrs. Scoville will not have "the nerve to run." That Mrs. Orr was begged to become the candidate and that "she had too much good sense"; that they tried to make goo-goo eyes at Dr. Dorothea Moores but that she had "too much Spartan firmness to be tempted." I am told also that the opponents of Mrs. White are "sore-heads," and thus do the ladies fight it out for supremacy. Meanwhile Mrs. White assumes the air of one who feels that it is all most unfortunate, but that it will all come right in the end. Her opponents say that unless she is relegated to the background harmony cannot be restored.

Has Confidence in Banning

United States Attorney Marshall B. Woodworth states that there is no occasion for an investigation of his office. And yet his assistant, Mr. Edward J. Banning, is said to be an habitue of the race track. Perhaps, when it is too late, Mr. Woodworth will regret that an investigation was not held.

At last there are signs of life, other than that contributed by the workmen, about St. Dunstan's. Except for a few fancy touches, the big apartment house is finished, and guests are moving in. The amateur housekeepers, however, will have to depend on their own cooking for a few more days, when Mr. Tait expects to have his dining room in working order.

A Picturesque Dungeon

Mrs. Oelrichs whetted the appetite of a little coterie of good livers the other night by a description of the beefsteak dinners given at the "Jolly Dungeon" in New York. J. Pierpont Morgan recently entertained a dozen millionaires in this cellar, and Mrs. John Jacob Astor has cards out for a beefsteak dinner. Calve gave one of these dinners in the "Jolly Dungeon" a week ago. The smart set and theatrical folk are rushing the place and Benny Singer, the proprietor, ex-stage manager, and formerly associate of the late Charley Hoyt, is a contented man for his bank account waxeth plump. "We must have a 'Jolly Dungeon' in San Francisco" chorus the bohemian wing of society, and rumor has it one of the Blingum polo players is going to back the scheme. The New York "Dungeon" is in a West Twenty-fourth street cellar. It is reached down a flight of steps from the pavement and along a dark hall. Weird music comes from the distance; there is a clanking of chains and a rattling of padlocks as the barred doors swing open. Then the lights go up and reveal a big cellar with a crude board floor and walls of rough hewn stone. From the low rafters overhead hang beer steins, old firearms and rusty bibelots of the Fatherland. The door and windows are barred like a dungeon. On an empty beer cask in the centre of the room, celery hearts are kept on tap and through the stone wall protrude the heads of other beer barrels full of good cheer.

Ragtime and Steaks

The tables are boxes; coarse towels do duty as napkins, and each guest is swathed in a butcher apron. Knives, forks, plates, in fact the whole crockery list, are tabu. Succulent slices of piping hot steak are served in thin pieces of toast, and the aprons sponge up any beefsteak drippings that may trickle through the fingers. "Benny" broils the steaks over charcoal in sight of the diners, and Mrs. Oelrichs says it's wonderful what an amount one can eat in this way on toast. Nothing but beefsteak, big English mutton chops, celery and beer is ever served in the "Jolly Dungeon." But the dinner always lasts hours for the colored waiters who pass the steak are also ragtime artists, and after the feed the piano and banjos are put into action and the guests sing darktown melodies or cake walk. The Pierpont Morgan dinner was a stag affair, but Mrs. "Stuyvie" Fish and other fashionable hostesses have entertained large parties of friends in this primitive fashion. Hurry up Blingum, and give us a "Jolly Dungeon." It makes our chops water to think of eating beefsteak without cutlery, even as the "Little Corporal" loved to finger his meat. Fancy Mrs. Salisbury or Ned Greenway, the Napoleons of the smart set, with steak juice dripping from their finger tips!

"Did he have any proof of his wife's infidelity?"

"Yes, he found out that she had a craze for the most expensive lingerie."

Branded for Life

There are three young women in San Jose whose devotion to their sorority will cause them to carry through life its initiations on the backs of their pretty hands. Now, when they are nineteen and in the bud of beauty, they can afford to smile at the result of their indiscretion, but a decade will perhaps make them shed bitter tears, for when one is thirty the possession of the letters D I X strongly marked upon the back of one's not-so-pretty hand is hardly a charm with which to conjure. San Jose society is gossiping wildly over the incident, and the fact that one of the teachers of the college in the Garden City is a member of the sorority and was a witness to the initiation has not lessened the chatter of the shocked. The names of the decorated are Miss Nettie Wilder, Miss Gene Weston and Miss Cora McCracken. They belong to the Delta Iota Chi. Usually in the ceremony of inducting the neophytes into the D I X, iodine is used to stamp the letters of the society upon their hands, but in the iniation a few nights ago nitrate of silver was substituted. The solution was as strong as an army mule, and after all three of the fair maidens had been properly hand-painted, the mistake was realized. There were shrieks and sobbings and a wild rush of members to procure remedies, but all in vain. The initiated young ladies had to bear their sufferings as they might, and it was not until the next day that they received medical attention. It developed that the nitrate of silver was obtained in the college laboratory. Several hours of settling gave added strength to the mixture, and the trio of victims will not forget the night they rode the goat. Nor will their friends forget it, for the letters will stick closer than a sweetheart.

In Honor of Miss Thornton

The musicale given by Mrs. Oxnard on Sunday last was in honor of Miss Lucille Thornton, who is visiting the coast as the guest of Mrs. A. B. McCreery. Mrs. Oxnard's guests had an opportunity of hearing Miss Thornton sing, which was one of the attractions offered, she being a prize pupil of the celebrated teacher, Madame de la Grange, in Paris. Miss Thornton is a daughter of the Montana branch of that large family connection, and her sister having married James Oxnard accounts for the particular attention paid her by the Robert Oxnards of this city. She is said to have a voice and style of singing strongly reminiscent of Mrs. Stuart Taylor.

Mrs. McCreery's Return

It must seem strange to tread one's native heath again after an absence of thirty-five years or more and no wonder that Mrs. McCreery, who is paying a visit to her old home after such a flight of time, finds changes both in place and people. As Belle Swearingen, she grew up in San Francisco, and during her girlhood numbered among her admirers her present husband, who was at that time porter in a Front street liquor house and also an inmate of her mother's boarding-house in Ellis street. But the fair Belle would not smile favorably upon him until, owing to a friendly tip, he invested in Gould and Curry. The rise in stock made him rich, and then all was plain sailing for the manly young Irishman. Rumor, however, did say at the time that some other fair one claimed prior rights. Those were not the days of elaborate weddings and this, which took place in dimly lit Grace church one night, was of so quiet a character that the general public was excluded; the bride's mother and sister—with the church sexton—made up the entire audience, and gossip says that "one of the finest" occupied a seat on the box beside the driver of the carriage which conveyed the bride and groom from the church to a down-town hotel, as a protection against a possible assault on the part of the aggrieved fair one.

Her Parisian Accent

The McCreerys left on the next steamer for the East, going direct to Paris, and the following year returned on a visit to the whilom bride's sister, Mrs. S. J. Field, in Washington. There a San Francisco woman met her at a ladies' lunch party and upon her return here reported that it was really painful to hear Mrs. McCreery try to speak English, she had become so Frenchified. Adelaide Murphy and Jennie Blair can speak French well, and Marie Wells can manage it without the Parisian accent, but the best French accent that has ever been heard on the lips of a San Franciscan is that of Mrs. Andrew McCreery. When Mrs. McCreery was Miss Swearingen she spent more time on her French than her English, and her long residence abroad has given her plenty of opportunity for practice. Mrs. McCreery is occupying the Moody residence during her stay here, for she does not care for hotel life. Her husband owns all sorts of houses in San Francisco, but none is his residence. He is as rich as Croesus. Three young McCreerys are employed in the capitalist's office. His eldest son, Robert, married Edith Kip, a daughter of Colonel Lawrence Kip of New York, and a niece of dear old Bishop Kip of this city, God rest his soul! But Robert McCreery does not live in New York, but in London. The New York McCreerys, A. B.'s brother's family, have all sorts of money, which came from honest trade.

Mrs. McCreery is an aunt of the clever Whitney girls of Oakland and of the two Condit-Smiths, one of whom married General Leonard Wood, President Roosevelt's chum among the Rough Riders, and the other married young Lieutenant Hooker.

His Haunting Dread

There are many in the older set who remember Andrew McCreery's haunting dread. He lived in constant fear of being poisoned. Never a tyrant Emperor or a Nihilist cowed Czar watched his food more fearfully. It was always, "You first, my dear Alphonse," when the wine goblets were passed and he never touched his glass until satisfied that no poison lurked in its bubbles. A wag who knew his failing was playing cards one night with McCreery and several other gentlemen. At the second round of wine, the wit suddenly pressed his hand to his heart, threw back his head, and groaned, "I've been poisoned! Some one must have meant this glass for you, McCreery, and I got it instead."

"Thank God!" ejaculated the millionaire.

Here the supposedly poisoned man straightened up and his loud guffaws made it plain to McCreery that the drinks were on him. He stood treat but it was noticed that he did not touch the glass himself, for he had not recovered from the shock.

Another time a young medico was pressed into a joke on McCreery. It was at a stag dinner and one of the conspirators remarked:

"Aren't you feeling well, McCreery? You turned a sickish green." Of course that was sufficient and soon the young sawbones was taking his victim's temperature.

"Have you eaten anything you shouldn't?" he asked, with his best professional air. The capitalist brokenly muttered that the salad had tasted rather peculiar, whereupon the doctor sniffed the innocent salad and solemnly whispered, "Arsenic!" McCreery submitted to a host of fake antidotes and was then pronounced fit as ever. It was not until the young medico returned the check sent him for "saving McCreery's life" that he realized the jokesmiths were at their pranks.

Bathed in Spirits

Francis Murphy, the originator of the Blue Ribbon movement, who for a score of years has earnestly battered the Demon Rum, and who has acquired a neat property in California through his vigorous efforts, is now assailing the serpent in his stronghold—Los Angeles. A bust of Miss Frances Willard received a baptism of whisky a few days ago by a convert to total abstinence. The lecturer was denouncing the Thing which stings, when a man who was convinced of the error of his ways arose and hurled a bottle of Very Old Private Stock at the platform to show his renunciation of the old life. The flask struck a statuette of the celebrated woman and the death-dealing liquor was spilled all over her features. Some of it ran into the rubbers of the preacher, and the crash created excitement among the audience. The proselyte affirmed his acceptance of the gospel of temperance, and Miss Willard's bust was wiped off to the tune of "I am Washed."

Cheeky "Jack" Chamberlain

Lieutenant-colonel "Jack" Chamberlain, Inspector General of the Army, whose reports of the Quartermaster's departments have stirred up army circles, is one of the youngest men of his rank in the army. He is known as "cheeky John," and it is said that he never failed to ask for anything he coveted. His assurance and persistence won for him his present rank. At the beginning of the late war he was a lieutenant, and an attache of the American Ambassador at Vienna. He was ordered home and appointed Captain. A little later he was promoted to the rank of Major and now, at the age of forty-one, he is a Lieutenant-Colonel.

A Rumor Revived

They are always looking for motives in society, and speculating upon what inspired this, and what was the incentive for that. Harry Holbrook gave a theatre party last week for the Spreckels girls, and once more the rumor of his engagement to one of them has been revived. Although the Holbrooks belong to the ultra-fashionable set they have been firmly entrenched only about three years. When Sam Knight married one of the Holbrook girls five years ago, they were only on the fringe. When Miss Olive made her debut a little more than three years ago they were still nobody, but by tact in differentiating those who should be cut and those to whom it was judicious to bow they have managed to get under the tent and squarely into the Big Show. Harry Holbrook has been of great assistance to the family for society mammas will be sweet to almost any girl who has an eligible brother.

Queer Jones

The late Winfield Jones was almost a crank in his aversion to anything like publicity regarding himself and his movements. Especially did he abhor what he called "newspaper notoriety," and he would as soon encounter the plague as a reporter of the daily press. It is now quite probable that his death will bring the notoriety he so avoided when in the flesh—that is, in the event of his will being contested. The court room last Monday fairly bristled with attorneys for the various beneficiaries. As a young man Mr. Jones made himself a great favorite with elderly ladies, who dearly loved to enjoy with him a dish of gossip along with a cup of tea, and in later years his ladies' lunches and afternoon teas in his esthetic house on Hyde street, where he was the only man present, were something to dream about. Very early in his San Francisco life, owing to his deferential manner to young girls, the sobriquet of "Harmless" and afterwards "Safety" were bestowed upon him by the dowagers, which latter name, particularly, clung to him in after years, much to his annoyance.

Among the social items in a local paper I notice an announcement of the engagement of Lieutenant Babcock, son of Mr. and Mrs. General Babcock, to Miss Eells. Would it be impertinent to ask what Mrs. Babcock is general of?

With the Money Makers

A Napoleon of Finance

For weeks the newspapers have chronicled the doings and sayings of a Prince. But here in San Francisco we have a King. One who would see him need only call at his suite, 508 California street. Letson Balliet, "The Young Napoleon of Finance" and "Mining King," he calls himself. What those who have trusted their money to him call him may not be set down here for fear of the displeasure of the postal authorities. He owns railroads, newspapers, mines, electric light works, and what not. He is under indictment in the Federal Court of Des Moines for alleged fraud. Uncle Sam says he sent letters through the mail calling attention to the White Swan gold mine of Baker City, Oregon, stating that the mine had been opened four hundred feet into the ground and that thousands of tons of ore were ready to be milled.

How he Splurges

Last June Uncle Sam denied the King the use of the mails. For some days his thousands of daily letters were kept from him. Then suddenly he was restored to the grace of the post-office. How this wonder was worked may not be said, but Balliet avers he took a carload of Congressmen to Washington and showed the Postmaster he was "the real thing." Balliet does his advertising by wholesale. Not long ago he bought a page of reading matter, praising himself in the New York Sun. He thinks nothing of using two or three pages in a big magazine to tell his own merits as a promoter and moneymaker. Among the titles he has conferred on himself besides "Napoleon of France" and "Mining King," are "The New Star of the West," "The Railroad Builder," "Bonanza Monarch," "Cecil Rhodes of America," "Marcus Daly of Oregon," and "Lipton of the Northwest."

In his Own Propria Persona

In the flesh, he is a slouchy fellow of about thirty, unkempt, tobacco-stained, swearing, loud and illiterate. He has nuggets glittering on his vest, in his cravat and on his desk; he pays all his bills and his credit is good at at least one bank. Once he had seventy thousand dollars on deposit here, and he may have as much now. His money comes from the poor. He sends out marvelous accounts of the riches of his mines and lets unfortunates in on the pay level. He will take as little as five dollars from those he likes and has hypnotized thousands into yielding their hard-earned store for investment in Balliet's "producers." He owns the Baker City Herald and probably the Boston Traveler. He gives passes on his railroad to allcomers, but the trains are pulled by Shanks' Mare, and there are no eating stations. He says he owns twenty-one operating mines and one hundred and thirty-two still undeveloped. He subsidizes newspapers and hires a corps of clever novelists to keep his fictional history and achievements before the public. Remember his office is at 508 California street, where he may be seen any day except Sundays and holidays. He still has shares to sell.

Local Stocks Dull

The week opened with rather a quiet market for stocks and bonds and trading on the Exchange was confined mostly to Market-street Railway and Spring Valley Water Stocks, but towards the close of the week business was more active and the market developed a stronger tone. Numerous railway bonds, many Sugar shares and miscellaneous stocks changed hands at good prices. Market-street Railway shares were strong throughout the week at $99.50, and there were more buyers than sellers. The rumor that the shares were soon to be listed on the New York Stock market strengthened holders' ideas as to values, and while the small blocks offering were being sold at $100, it is doubtful if a buyer could have obtained any quantity at that figure. The outline of the policy of the new syndicate is anxiously awaited for, and until its announcement trading will doubtless be confined to small parcels. Despite the reconsidering of the water rates by the Supervisors, Spring Valley sold well at sustained prices, and the bulk of the week's transactions were made at $91.75 to $92. San Francisco Gas and Electric Shares developed a showing of strength and commanded advanced values. Alaska Packers' ruled strong at $161.50, with few offers to sell.

The regular monthly dividend of 75 cents a share of the Giant Consolidated Powder Company, amounting to $15,000, was paid on Monday. The 60 cents a share dividend of the California Wine Association, amounting to $26,023.20, was also paid on the same day. Wednesday the Alaska Packers' Association paid its monthly dividend of $1 a share, which amounted to $48,000. The announcement that the new railway syndicate has asked for many new franchises for roads to run parallel to the two cable lines outside of the combination had no effect upon values for either the California-street or Union-street stocks, but should the franchises be granted, with the operating of the roads, the stocks would doubtless depreciate, as the new service, through transferring, would be a marked improvement over the present facilities, and would naturally capture the patronage.

Operations in the Pine-street mining market have been fairly active during the week, and prices for the leading stocks in the northern and southern groups of Comstocks were firmly sustained. Money was evidently more plentiful, and there was some inquiry for almost all stocks listed, which caused some little hardening in values. Ophir was particularly active owing to an improvement in the Burning Moscow ground of the mine and the stock developed considerable strength.

Hawaiian Sugar Stocks

Hawaiian sugar stocks are as inactive as a brass monkey, as far as the public is concerned. Almost all the stocks listed here may be bought for low prices, but buyers are playing a waiting game. There are many things which may influence the intrinsic value of these stocks, and people are holding off for developments. Some of these things are the attitude of the European Governments on the bounty question, the action of Congress on Cuban sugar, etc. P. N. Lilienthal of the Anglo-California bank is a believer in the future of Hawaiian sugar. All that is needed he says is economy and concentration. He says: "There will be an easier money market within four or six months at the most. Expenses of production in Hawaii must be reduced. The fields must be supplied with a labor which will make sugar culture possible on economical lines. I do not think it would be wise to inaugurate new sugar enterprises in Hawaii, but I do believe that sugar stocks will be worth more from now on." My advice to speculators is to hold on to sugar stocks they have, and to buy carefully of others—first knowing the plantation thoroughly, and secondly investigating the management. I shall have more to say of this hereafter.

Theories to the Winds

An investor writes to me and says: "I am told that in forty-five weeks out of fifty-two stocks can be bought cheaper on Monday than on any other day in the week. Is this so; if so, why?" It is hardly so. If it were and were known, everybody would buy stocks on Monday, and stocks would be dear on Mondays instead of cheap. One cannot speculate in the stock market by dream-book rules. All sorts of theories of this kind go wrong at times. Many influences bear upon the stock market. Monday might be a low day a dozen weeks running, and then might be high for a dozen weeks more. Perhaps the fact that Monday begins a new week, and that trade might be slow on the start might make some vacillating stocks low on that day. The only unchanging rule in speculation is that values determine prices in the long run, and that the only safe speculator is the one who foresees values and who buys accordingly. Good advice to one who is not on the inside is the best mascot. Theories of trading are almost worthless. You must either know the value of the stock ahead and stand upon it as an investor, or trade blindly on news or trade tendencies or sentiment with a two or three-point order for protection. Fortune-telling will not avail.

What the N. Y. Tribune of February 27, 1902 said about Egyptian Deities Cigarettes

"J. B. Duke, as the representative of the tobacco interests of the world at the Sherry luncheon yesterday, had prepared under his direction a present for PRINCE HENRY, which was delivered to him on board the Hohenzollern. It consisted of a large package, containing two thousand EGYPTIAN DEITIES CIGARETTES. The package was made up of twenty smaller boxes, each containing one hundred cigarettes, the wrappers of each being stamped with his name and crest. The boxes, made by Tiffany, were of Russia leather embossed in gold, with the crest of the Prince and the German coat of arms. Mr. Duke presented the cigarettes as a memento of the Prince's visit on behalf of The American Tobacco Company. The PRINCE accepted the present with a pleasant note of thanks." (Similar comments in New York Press, World, etc.)

In the World of Art

The interest being taken in the forthcoming Gump exhibition and sale of rare paintings is very active, and from present indications promises to eclipse any previous art exhibition held on this Coast. For years the firm of S. & G. Gump Co. has been distinguished as that of the representative art dealers of the West. Dilettante and connoisseur know Mr. Gump as a man who loves art for art's sake and is willing to sacrifice much time and trouble to bring the art standard of the community to its highest point. Every year Mr. Gump visits the salons of the European cities, buying such pictures as commend themselves to his judgment. The spring showing of the Gump gallery, which is looked forward to by all art lovers, will open at the Native Sons hall, Mason street, on the evening of March twenty-sixth, closing on the evening of the twenty-ninth, when the sale of the most beautiful oil paintings selected from European art centres will begin. The firm is now at work on the illustrated catalogue for the exhibition, which may be obtained at the exhibition rooms.

The Lilies and Languors of Virtue

[This journal, which came into my possession after its author's death, is in direct contradistinction to that of Anonyma, published last week, and is thus rendered a picturesque foreground for the other life story.]

Sheltered! I have been sheltered all my life. Why wasn't I permitted to run wild like my brothers? They at least tasted life's joys and now have something to feed their memories on. What a dull life I lead. Society, which the middle classes make the goal of their ambition: what is it? The smart set! Madre de Dios—smart! It is always stupid. The men are hypocrites, the women fools. Because we are their sisters and wives, they think it necessary to preserve a veneer of polish when in our presence, but if they knew what we know. Perhaps they do know that we know, but they conceal their kowledge for the sake of Us. They could not wound our moral sense. It would be discourteous.

* * * * * * *

Oh, for a new sensation! To live along, day after day, seeing and doing the same things—it is suffocating! If I could but take a leap, a spring into Life. If I could only fall in love, as so many of my friends have done. They think me too proud, too good, to act frivolously as they do. I am intrenched in a hopeless virtue, as impregnable as the great wall of China.

* * * * * * *

It is tiresome to be good. It is more tiresome when one has no desire to be anything else. But sometimes it would be a relief if one could cast aside convention and follow impulse. For instance last night, when Henry left me alone in the drawing-room with Tom Dare I had an insane desire come over me. I wanted to throw my arms about his neck and kiss him. I had hard work to restrain the impulse. Yet I do not love Tom. We are friends, that is all. He has been coming here so many years, he seems like a part of the menage. If anybody else had been sitting there opposite me, I should have felt the same impulse. I craved affection, demonstrative affection.

* * * * * * * *

Again, tonight, I had the same wild wish. I wanted to see Tom. He always understands my moods so well. If I could but have gone to him, put my hands on his shoulders, kissed him! Silly, wasn't it? Yet had I been Sapho, I should have followed my impulse. I would have gone to him at once. And then, aside from what his valet would have thought, Tom himself would have misconstrued my action. He would have thought I went because I loved him. Love is a queer thing. I wonder if I shall ever care for anybody, really? Sometimes I feel little desires toward this or that man, but they never last. Now this morning I felt that way toward Tom, and tonight I don't even care to see him. Why is it, I wonder?

* * * * * * * *

To be virtuous, to daily combat one's impulses, to live with one's heart contracting moment by moment—qui bono? I wonder if those women who love constantly are not, after all, better than we are, we on the other side of the fence? They at least give themselves—the greatest sacrifice of all. What do we give? What do I give? Nothing, nothing at all. I do not even care for my husband. But that does not trouble him. He long since ceased to care for me. When our first child was born he seemed to change. His interest died in me after an heir had been born. Do I love my children? Yes, I love them. They are mine, part of me. Yet even my mother love does not keep me from being bored. What is there in life, after all?

* * * * * * * *

My friend, Daisy Lorne, has been dropped by her family and friends. She went a step too far and her husband could not longer shut his eyes, they tell me. Poor Daisy! Yet not poor, for she followed the dictates of her heart. I went to see her today. She was surprised, for she had always thought me the soul of convention. But I wanted to know—to know if it were worth while. She says she is happy, but she trembles for fear it will not last. When her husband gets his divorce she will marry the man she loves. She seems to have no doubt he will marry her. I wonder if I could give up my home, my husband's name, my children—like that? Perhaps, if love could come to me as it did to Daisy.

* * * * * * * * * * *

I followed an impulse today. I lunched a deux with a man not my husband. I let him talk to me, seriously, of love. I fell in with his mood as far as I could. I let him hold my hand. I even promised to drive with him, tomorrow. Well, walled in by my virtue as I am, no harm can come of it.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Bah! No harm came of it, 'tis true, only an intense disgust on my part. Truly, I must be lacking in moral stamina in spite of my ancestors, for though he was bold he did not shock me. My sense of delicacy was offended, that was all. And—he bored me. My first peep through the high wall that separates vice from virtue was not a glimpse into enchantment. I am not good. I am only super-esthetic.

* * * * * * * * * * *

What a bore society is! The same old round—dinner, lunch, tea, ball. When I look forward to the summer, the vista is no more attractive. We shall have our country-house thronged with visitors and Henry will be happy playing host to some pretty bud. I was told today that Henry had a particular friend of my sex on whom he is showering attentions and gifts—bought with my money. I even heard whispers of a luxuriously appointed flat. This is my chance, said my informant, to be in fashion and get a divorce. "A divorce?" I returned, with indignation—well assumed—"and disgrace the name my children bear?" In reality I was not thinking of my little ones. But why go to the trouble of divorcing Henry when I have no one else in view? I suppose the word will now go forth that I am a model mother and prefer to nurse a wounded heart rather than cause my offspring—and his—a moment's pang. What a pity I cannot feel jealous!

* * * * * * * * * * *

Henry commanded me today to go no longer to see my friend Daisy. She is beyond the pale, he said. Her divorce is a matter of months now but she has not married the man. I told Henry that I would not cast aside my friend of years because of an error of judgment on her part. He said nothing more. But I must see this man whom Daisy loves so. I can't imagine my doing anything like that. Curious, I never even asked his name. As Henry was leaving I said, "By the way, why doesn't Tom Dare come here any more?" He laughed, quietly, "Tom Dare?" he returned, "why, Tom wouldn't dare, now," and laughed again at the wretched pun. "But why?" I asked. "Why? Why?" He laughed more loudly as he opened the door, "well, you'd better ask your friend Daisy that." And then I knew—knew not only that but that I loved Tom Dare!

* * * * * * * * * * *

It came upon me with a great rush. That, then, was the explanation of the tenderness I had always felt for Tom. And I had never known. So often had I longed to throw my arms about his neck, to kiss his dear white brow, to twine my fingers through his hair! So often had I longed for him when I was alone! And I called it friendship.

* * * * * * * * * * *

I had refused to obey Henry's command about seeing Daisy more, and set my will against his. Can I go, now? Can I bear to see her raptures? I ought to despise Tom, for he has failed to do what is right. I wonder—I wonder if I could make him set the wrong right? He always liked me. We were always—oh, yes, friends. How foolish of me to think of ever trying to like that other man, the man of the luncheon and drive! It must have been because—oh, yes, Tom was away that week.

* * * * * * * * * * *

I sent for him and he came at once. Oh, yes, this is love. I had to bite my lips to keep from breaking down before him. We talked in our old friendly way. I knew how to get at his conscience. He will do what is right, I know, now. But my heart, that newly awakened heart, is dead within me. After all, I could never have told him. I am not like Daisy. I could not bear to go aside from the narrow path. I was born with morals as with manners. It is no credit to me that I am good. Daisy comes of different stock.

Draper and Tailor
117 MONTGOMERY ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

A letter from Tom: "I will do your bidding, dear. It is best that I should make Daisy happy and I think I can. I will think it over, but it will be as you say. But it is no harm to tell you now. You are the only woman I ever loved, or ever could love. Ah, dear! so many times I longed to tell you—but even in our world, where married ties are considered so lightly, you were different. You shone like a pure white star. I could not cast a shadow on that pure surface. Good-bye, dear. May you always be happy." Ah, Tom! Tom! he did not know me, he did not know that my purity was only a matter of not being able to be otherwise. My frenzied attempts after new sensations he never knew. I could kill myself—to think that I should be so different. Daisy gave all for him—and he did not even love her. I—would I, even now, if Daisy were not there or never had been there, would I give up the world for Tom's love?

* * * * * * * * * * *

I have thought it out. No, I never could. It is better thus. I could not throw aside all that I have been brought up to believe in, for the love of a man. Daisy is greater than I.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Henry is dead. I am a widow. I can write that calmly. Henry was not a good husband. A glad thought rises in my heart. Tom—Tom—I can love him now without sin. He said he would "think over" what I said to him about Daisy. Well, he shall not "think it over" any more. I shall write to him to come to me. What of Daisy, my old friend? Would I take her all from her? Yes, yes, I must have my share of happiness. Ah, God! to think of the years I have starved myself, the years I have lived without love.

* * * * * * * * * * *

I have been two days a widow and I shall be perfectly happy in fifteen minutes. It sounds wrong, does it not? I ought to be weeping but I am more lighthearted if anything than my little children are. Tom must surely be here soon—I sent for him today and gave him two as the hour. It is nearly that. I have ordered for lunch all the things he likes with the white wine of which he was always so fond. Sometimes I feel a qualm when I think of Daisy. But she had him for a while. She knew, when she went away with him, that their happiness would be but temporary.

* * * * * * * * * * *

It is all over. They are married. A wire from Tom: "We are married. Tell Henry. Good-bye. Off for Europe." Too late, then. He did not even know that I was free. He did not get my message. He does not know that I love him, that I have always loved him, and I cannot tell him—now.

* * * * * * * * * * *

A long, lone vista stretches out before me. A blind rage possesses my heart. Why was I so sheltered all my life? Why was I so cold in my virtuous exterior that Tom never dared disturb my purity? Oh, God! I hate the word. Yet even now, I know that had he told me, while I was Henry's wife, I should have spurned him.

STAGE

Melbourne and Blanche

While Blanche Walsh is playing at one theatre next week in the drama built for her by Harry Dam, Melbourne McDowell will be at another in his late wife's version of Sardou's "Cleopatra." Florence Stone has fitted much better into the roles of Fanny Davenport than Blanche Walsh did, though the latter was chosen by the creator of the parts to be her successor in them. It is a kind of a mystery why Miss Walsh ever broke her partnership with MacDowell. Her own version of the split is that the actor persecuted her with his undesired attentions. He was not always himself and she averred that for her own safety she could not longer stay with his company. I have been told that MacDowell was then so infatuated with her that he gave her not only all of his late wife's elegant and costly costumes but all her valuable jewels as well. I have further heard that when Blanche Walsh struck a hard streak of luck she pawned all these gifts and that she was never able to get them out. But this is all Rialto gossip and may be no more truthful than the ravings the phonograph parlors advertise as those of poor John McCullough.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co. are most effective.

When Blanche was Youug

Old-timers on the Bowery always speak of Blanche Walsh as "Fatty Walsh's daughter." The New York boss is dead now and can no longer follow with proud eyes the dramatic career of his idolized daughter. It was Marie Wainwright, by the way, who was Blanche's first patron and preceptor. Miss Wainwright helped the girl on in every way she could, for she predicted a great future for her. The first time the little Walsh girl appeared in public as a professional was at the Windsor theatre fourteen years ago at a Sunday night benefit for the family of Dr. William Dwyer. Before this she had appeared in amateur performances of "The School for Scandal," "The Hunchback" and other standard plays. She is a product of the New York public school and was considered a very precocious kid when at the age of thirteen she graduated from the grammar school in Twentieth street.

By the way, the word has gone forth that Blanche Walsh is to revive Maurice Barrymore's "Nadjesda." Of the first production of that play the veteran Harry St. Maur recently wrote: "It is fine to reign, alluring to please. The temptation to dominate with delight is irresistible—and Barrymore yielded." "Nadjesda" is the drama that Barrymore accused Sardou of plagiarizing in his "Fedora."

Our Blanche is Beloved

No actress in New York, writes a correspondent, is more popular among her professional acquaintance than Blanche Bates. Everybody likes her, she is always so full of fun and life. Lately, when she had the fever of which she nearly died, she had her head shaved and so she has to wear a wig until the new hair grows in. It is too bad to think of all that beautiful black hair having to be sacrificed. But Blanche makes a joke of it. Behind the scenes she pulls her wig off and makes the members of the company laugh. Her popularity extends beyond the bounds of her company. At the Wednesday matinees any number of stage people come to see her play, and afterwards visit her in her dressing room, Lillian Russell and Mrs. Leslie Carter among the others. "Under Two Flags" will run until the summer.

Susie Kelleher daughter of Alfred Kelleher, is playing a small part in "Notre Dame" in New York and her work is well spoken of. She inherits her talent from both sides of the family. Her mother was Susan Galton, a favorite opera singer before she gave up her public career for domestic life. Susie's sister Blanche was on the stage before she married a wealthy lumber merchant, and retired to private life.

The Power of Smiles

I saw Cinquevalli a good many years ago. I think it was in Toronto with the Hopkins Transatlantiques—and never forgot the way he juggled with a cannon ball, bottle and wad of paper. He still keeps that feat on his program, with his famous billiard cue act and other things. The tub, brush and chair idea is something new. If Cinquevalli were not a juggler, he would be a successful farce comedian. His face is a fortune in itself and his smile is worth more than Cissy Fitzgerald's wink. His business with his "sprite" is so amusing that one forgets the wonders and difficulties of his jugglery while laughing at the antics of the assistant. There is a good deal in looking pleasant. Cinquevalli would not be half such a favorite if a stern frown took the place of his merry smile. Another instance on this week's Orpheum bill where smiles contribute to a triumph are the ten Nelsons. These remarkable acrobats are the most happy appearing double quintet you can imagine. Their work is extraordinary for its originality and difficulty, yet after a succession of wonder-provoking double somersaults and acrobatic posings, they all bob up with smiling faces; not the superior all-conquering smile of the average vaudeville artist, but a nice, comfortable smile that warms the audience's heart. Then there are the three clever dancing Dawsons, man, woman and little girl. Their smiles are simply infectious.

Attractions Next Week

Fanny Rice is in vaudeville now and will be at the Orpheum next week. She has a novelty she calls "Surprises," in which she gives character sketches in miniature. Alice Beach McComas, Piutti's clever piano pupil, accompanies Fanny Rice. The Silvers will give illustrated songs and ballads. They are the originators of this form of entertainment and all their numbers were written especially for them. Cinquevalli will stay another week, varying his turn. Another attraction will be little Kathleen Parlow, the phenomenal child violinist.

Melbourne MacDowell's success of last season at the Grand Opera House will no doubt be duplicated during his engagement, which begins next week. "Cleopatra" will be the opening bill with Florence Stone in the title role and MacDowell as Antony. New scenery and costumes have been made and the production is still under the direction of Frank Willard, who was associated in his present capacity with the late Fanny Davenport.

The libretto of "Little Christopher," which will be the bill at Fischer's beginning Monday night, was written by George R. Sims and Cecil Raleigh, and the music by Ivan Caryll and Gustave Kerker. The story lays claim to originality and is said to be full of the daintiest airs, with a chorus to match. The costumes have been made expressly for this local presentation and the piece will be splendidly mounted. Pilar Morin will be the title hero and all the members of the company will have good parts. Mr. Blake, who has such a fine voice, will be Chauncey Depew.

Though "The Fortune Teller" is ready for production at the Tivoli, the public seems not to have had enough of "The Serenade," which is drawing enormous houses and seems to call for an indefinite run.

Blanche Walsh's engagement at the Columbia is limited to one week. "La Madeleine" will be given every week night and Saturday matinee, "Janice Meredith" on Thursday afternoon and Sunday evening. "La Madeleine" has a plot of the "Camille" order, but its scenic features are its strong point. One scene represents the interior of a noted Parisian church. "The Christian" with Elsie Leslie and E. J. Morgan, comes on March twenty-fourth.

"On and Off," which Charles Frohman considered the funniest and most novel farce he ever produced, will have its first stock presentation at the Alcazar next week. The play has a most amusing plot and its fun is of the fast and furious order. Juliet Crosby, who was seriously ill, has now quite recovered, and will have the role of Lisette. "The Lash of the Whip" is in preparation.

"Oliver Twist" is drawing well at the Central and will be followed on Monday with "The Bowery After Dark," in which Jimmy Britt will be the star.

A Captivating Singer

Katherine Fisk had sung only a few phrases of her opening number on Tuesday evening when it was apparent that she had won her audience. This favorable impression deepened as the program progressed and at its close there were no words but praise for the charming singer. It is so seldom one hears a real contralto voice, rarely indeed among the great stars that come this way. Mrs. Fisk's voice is warm and rich and she has the natural instinct for true emotional color. She has a naturally warm temperament, too, and a potent personality. Her diction and phrasing are of the clearest. Her voice is of the kind that finds a responsive cloud in the auditor and moves to laughter or to tears as the singer wills. There were four groups of songs, ranging over a wide field of composition. The first group consisted of Secchi's Lungi del Caro Bene, Brahms' Feldeinsamkeit, Schubert's Der Tod und das Madchen, and Hollaender's Winternacht, in which the singer's delicate phrasing was highly artistic. The second group contained Lalo's L'Esclave, Fontenailles' Obstination and Chaminade's The Silver Ring. Most charming of all in their artistic simplicity of expression were the five songs of the third group—Oh, That We Two Were Maying, Nevin; The Dandelion, Chadwick; The Slumber Boat, Gaynor; The Japanese Love Song, Thomas; and The Gardener and the Rose, by Emil Bruguiere. The singer's perfect enunciation contributed to the charm of her interpretation. Emil Bruguiere's song is really a lovely thing and that the audience appreciated it was evidenced by the fact that they called for its repetition. The final number contained the three arias from Saint-Saens' "Samson et Delila," and in these Mrs. Fisk's great dramatic power was shown, and the wonderful strength and beauty of her tones. Though Mrs. Fisk was called out many times to bow her thanks to emphatic applause she granted but three encores, once repeating the song—Emil Bruguiere's—and in the other instances giving a German kinder-song and "The Gingerbread Man." Her recitals on Thursday afternoon and last evening can only be mentioned here, as they occurred too late in the week for more than that. There will be a matinee recital today.

The Musical Atmosphere

Since Maude Fay's departure for Europe to pursue her studies there have not failed the usual remarks about the inadequate teaching to be obtained in this city, when people have to be sent abroad for their music lessons. This is by no means the case. Splendid groundwork can be obtained here, and indeed a full musical education as far as technique and that. But one cannot get the musical atmosphere outside of Europe. It was Walter Damrosch who advised Maude Fay to go abroad, "simply," as he explained, "because there are better opportunities in a city like Dresden to hear constantly all the great operas. Then such a voluntary exile will take her away from her friends and social pleasures and enable her to concentrate herself absolutely on her work."

Messrs. Bouvier and Greenbaum announce two more important musical attractions. The first is Mr. Max Heinrich, the eminent basso and pianist, and his daughter Julia Heinrich, a contralto, whose singing created quite a sensation on their previous visit some four years ago. They are presenting a great novelty this season in the melodramatic musical setting of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden," by Richard Strauss, the composer, who is now attracting as much attention by his innovations as did Richard Wagner. The Eastern press is most enthusiastic in its praise of the Heinrichs in this work. About the middle of April the great pianist, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, will be heard in four recitals. It is six years since her last visit here. Since then Madame Zeisler has toured Europe with phenomenal success and has taken a rank second to no living pianist.

Next Monday evening the members of the dramatic department of the Von Meyerinck school will give a recital at Sherman-Clay hall. The program will include Hofmann's cantata, "Song of the Norns," the song cycle, "Eliland," by Miss Feldheim, excerpts from "Der Freischutz," and a fencing exhibition.

Anna Moore, who will make her first public appearance at the Pasmore concert next Tuesday, is from Vacaville, and has been studying with Mr. Pasmore for the past two years. She has a soprano voice of exceedingly fine character and sings emotional songs with true feeling. "Within a Maiden's Heart," by the young London composer, Clarence Lucas, is said to be peculiarly suitable to her voice and temperament.

A series of scenes in costume from light and grand operas—"Freischuetz," "Tannhauser," "Trovatore," "Ernani," "Maritana," "Le Nozze di Figaro," "Carmen" and others—will be sung and acted by some of the advanced pupils of Joseph Greven at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s hall, on the eighth of April.

San Franciscans visiting New York find that Signor Abramoff is a prominent figure in Gotham's musical circles. He sings at concerts and in smart drawing-rooms and is a great favorite.

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought or other fads. Instruction private, not classes. Last Week's Events

Last week was essentially a musical week. There was scarcely a day without its concert, either a matinee or an evening affair. But wasn't it a pity that the first concert of the rehabilitated Philharmonic Society should have occurred on such a stormy night? The program, under Giulio Minetti's direction, consisted of a Von Suppe overture, Beethoven's first symphony, a Tschaikowsky selection for strings, and Strauss' "Tales from the Vienna Woods." Miss Grace Freeman, who played a violin obligato at the second Nordica recital, was the soloist of the evening, rendering Godard's concerto Romantique with orchestral accompaniment. The Harmony Zither Club quartet also assisted in the program. The officers of the Philharmonic are: Emil Greenebaum, president; Joseph M. Willard, vice-president; R. B. Hochstadter, treasurer; Ed. T. Swendson, librarian; E. M. Hecht, secretary. The last symphony concert of the second Steindorff series was artistically successful and much enthusiasm and many flowers were lavished upon the director. The program consisted of Beethoven's Eroica symphony, "The Flying Dutchman" overture, a beautiful Norwegian folks-melody by Svensen, a tender serenade for strings by Pierne and Chabrier's "Espanola." While by no means the most interesting of the programs given during the season, it was full of variety and was as a whole well executed. It is to be hoped that a new series of concerts will be given ere long, for now that the orchestra is getting accustomed to the work, and plays so well under Mr. Steindorff's leadership, it is a thousand pities to have to drop practice. Emma Nevada gave her last concert on Saturday, the audience according her a very warm welcome. But again, as at the first concert, it was Pablo Casals who aroused the most enthusiastic applause. He is certainly one of the greatest violoncellists who have ever visited us. Maquarre, the flutist, also came in for his share of applause. His boyish manner and attractive individuality are factors that seem to contribute to his success. He has a frank and pleasing smile that instantly wins him the audience's friendship. Leonora Jackson's recital on the preceding evening did not draw a large audience, but it was a thoroughly musical one, enjoying all the numbers with understanding of their parts. Miss Jackson deserves the praise she has received from critics all over the world. She is not merely a graceful and charming player. Those terms belong to many violinistes. Miss Jackson's playing has more than grace and charm. It has power, strength and personality. She played the Vieuxtemps concerto in D minor with a splendid grasp of the composer's intention, Saint-Saens' "The Swan," Sarasate's "Gypsy" fantasia, a Tschaikowsky "Humoreske" and other numbers with a fine regard for their varied emotions. Harry J. Fellows, the tenor, sang several selections and created a very favorable impression. William Bauer was the satisfactory accompanist of the evening.

Miss Jackson and Aileen McCabe

Leonora Jackson takes as great an interest in young violinists as Calve does in juvenile singers. Aileen McCabe played at the Palace hotel last week before Miss Jackson, and the latter clapped her hands in delight. She gave it as her opinion that little Aileen has a remarkable future before her, and she encouraged her to keep at her studies. Miss Jackson is a fine example of what steady study and practice, added to wonderful talent, can achieve in a short time. She is only a young girl herself. Her mother travels with her and it was she who arranged the meeting of her gifted daughter and Noah Brandt's little pupil.

Samuel Adelstein, whose "Mandolin Memories" were so warmly received, is at work on another series, "The Mandolin and Its Music," for the New York Cadenza. Mr. Adelstein has made the study of the plectrum instruments his life work and has helped to give them their proper place among legitimate instruments. Mr. Adelstein's large class of pupils has been augmented by students from other States.

The Potter Opus One

A pirated edition of Margaret Horton Potter's novel, "A Social Lion," which created such a stir in Chicago two or three years ago, is about to be issued against the wishes of Miss Potter (now Mrs. Black) and her family. Miss Potter was a very young girl at the time that this first book made its appearance, and even had it been all that it was said to be, some allowance should have been made for youthful precocity, but it is pretty well understood by this time that the reason for the "blackguard slating" which was meted out to both book and author was the result of disappointed social ambition. The critic into whose hands the volume first fell laid her failure to make headway amongst the haut ton of the Lakeside district to the opposition of the Potters, and she made the most of her opportunity to hit back. She professed to find the novel, which the Potters claim to have been a pure invention, full of portraits, which she did not hesitate to hint at identifying, and at the same time she otherwise intimated that the torrid "Quick or the Dead?" of Amelie Rives was an iceberg beside the production of the Chicago girl. Only a limited number of volumes had been issued when the attack was made, and the Potters, who owned the plates, called in the edition and stopped further issue, hoping in this way to let the matter die out of mind. Unfortunately the malicious attack was copied and commented on in all quarters of the United States. We of the Pacific Coast cannot hold ourselves guiltless in the matter, though so far as is known, not a single copy ever found its way out here. It seems that the copyright was in the name of "Robert Daley Williams," assumed for the purpose of authorship, and this leaves the loophole for pirating. Of course an effort will be made to prevent the publication, but it will mean vexatious litigation if nothing else, and since there is always the possibility of defeat in any appeal to the law, it would seem to an onlooker as if the wisest plan would be for the Potters to forestall the conscienceless publisher by authorizing a new edition themselves. The circumstances surrounding the withdrawal of the novel are sufficient to force any edition into the first rank of the best selling, and it is only common justice that Miss Potter should reap the profit from her work. In the long run it will have to stand or fall by its own merits.

Books with Living Qualities

Eden Phillpotts has been engaged for a year past on a new novel, "The River," which he does not expect to have ready for publication before the fall of next year. There are very few living writers who are content to work as slowly as Mr. Phillpotts, and it is superfluous to add, equally few whose work is worth as much. Each individual member of the writing fraternity seems to have entered into competition not only with every other novelist, but with himself as well, and it is a race against time to see who will turn out work the fastest. Leaving out Andrew Lang, who is suspected of "being a syndicate," and not an individual at all, there are none of the prolific authors who can be mentioned in the same category as the few who work slowly and conscientiously. The "best sellers" may make more money, but they do not make more friends. Six months after some worthless book has enjoyed a boom, copies which have scarcely been handled can be bought or half price or less at the second-hand shops, and there is no brisk inquiry for them even there. Apparently no one cares to read them twice and they are not valued even as ornaments to the bookcase, despite the fact that they are attractively bound. Hewlett, Hardy, Phillpotts and Mrs. Voynich are amongst the best of our modern authors, and except Hardy, who has been a long time at his desk, none of them is prolific. When it comes to thinning out accumulations and discarding what is comparatively worthless, theirs will not be amongst the books cast aside. It might give writers a very much modified impression of their own worth, if they would occasionally look over the shelves of a second-hand shop and see how readily their productions are parted with. One can find copies of most of the light and frothy books second-hand almost as soon as they come from the press, and the "society novel" which deals only with a passing phase of existence is discarded as readily as a last summer's frock. It is true that there is not much hope in the prospect of "writing for posterity," for posterity is not either reading or buying books now, but it is a poor product of the pen which will not survive for half a year. Slovenly writers make slovenly readers. Librarians, as well as book dealers, assert that though there is a steady demand for the works of what we are pleased to call the standard authors, there is little chance that the latest sensations will reach the same point in time, for after the first excitement has passed over and "everybody" has read them, they lie undisturbed on the shelves for months, and are finally disposed of because they are dead stock or occupying space which cannot be spared.

Matilda Serao, the Italian novelist recently discovered by the English translator, has sued her husband for divorce on entirely new and original grounds. Signor Serao is the editor of the Mattino, and the lady claims that he "has compromised her in a Neapolitan municipal scandal." It is a foretaste of what will happen when women have obtained their "right" of suffrage. Then we shall have shoals of divorces asked for on the grounds of "incompatibility of political views."

An amusing incident has come to light in connection with Tolstoi's "Resurrection." It will be remembered that the book was ostentatiously advertised as a wholesale charity, the proceeds of its sale to be devoted to assisting those malodorous Doukhobors to emigrate to this country. The Society of Friends has been interested in the immigrants, some of whose doctrines and tenets resemble those of the Quakers, but the Special Committee to whom the English translators of the Tolstoi book sent a small check returned the money on the ground that the book was indecent and they could not use money obtained by such means any more than if it were derived from the sale of improper photographs. Naturally the Tolstoians are up in arms over the matter. No one else cares.

Smart Set for March is an unusually bright number for even that brilliant publication. Of special interest to local readers are "A Little Supper in San Francisco," by Gelett Burgess, and "A Study in Suggestion," by Emma Wolf. Miss Wolf, like Frank Norris, has quite a clientele in London, where her stories are eagerly looked for and appreciatively read. The March Overland has some notable articles in its table of contents. Since animal bography first became a fad, there has been nothing better than Cloudesley Rutter's "Life and Death of Chouicha, a Sacramento River Salmon." "Jim and Kittick" is a tale of the Nome beach by Josephine Scroggs ,and S. Homer Henley's story, "According to Scripture," is the most original plot of love and revenge that has appeared for a long while.

Marie Corelli's latest tirade, on the subject of "Germanizing" the uniforms of the British army, contained a statement that many of the highest officers had confided to her their opinions on on the subject. Needles to say, the officers agreed with the fair Marie, possibly for pecuniary reasons, though it would not do to hint at aught but patriotism. The absurdity of the idea that Miss Corelli was acting as mother confessor to the army was too apparent to be overlooked, but an explanation was forthcoming. It seems that Marie is engaged on a military novel, and she has been in correspondence with the heads of the army. One would suppose that this might be a ticklish time for British army officers to be entering into correspondence with civilians, and especially with any one who has such a propensity for rushing into print. However, it has furnished Marie with an excuse to scold and an advance notice for her novel. Far be it it from her to neglect her opportunities.

The Preferred Roofing

The damage done by the recent storms has proved to San Francisco builders that they can no longer erect flimsy structures for dwelling houses. After the foundation, the most important thing to be looked to is the roof. For roofing nothing nowadays is so universally used as slate, whose chief strongpoints are cheapness, durability and beauty. Artists and architects highly commend the slate roof, which is absolutely fireproof thus lessening the price of a building's insurance, never needs repairs, does not require painting, and never discolors or fades. The Eureka Slate Company is turning out an immense quantity of slate from its quarries at Kelsey, El Dorado county. This slate has no superior in beauty and durability, is of fine quality, lustrous and black. The Eureka Company, Room 15, Mills Building, second floor, is prepared to furnish slate for immediate delivery anywhere, in unlimited quantities and all sizes.

SUMMONS

In the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

Della St. Claire Weston, Plaintiff, vs. William Henry Weston, Defendant. } Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to William Henry Weston, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or, if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made. All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred. And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and two.

ALBERT MAHONY, Clerk.

Music—Continued

The Pasmore Concert

The Fifth Pasmore concert, dated for next Tuesday evening, will be given at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, the audiences having outgrown the maple room of the Palace. Miss Beulah George, who so pleased Madame Nevada by her singing two years ago that she still remembers the young singer and her work, will sing the Bell song from "Lakme" in the original key—E minor. Mr. Pasmore will do the great recitative and aria from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," "I rage, I melt, I burn," and "O Ruddier than the Cherry," accompanied by Mrs. O. K. Cushing. The accompaniment of the aria is of quite as much importance as the voice part. Miss Adelaide Birchler, who is fast gaining the recognition she so well deserves, will sing "Ah Mio Cor," by Handel, and "Von ewigen Liebe," by Brahms, while Mrs. Basford is down for "The Nightingale," by Delibes, which will be a decided departure from her usual style of song. The famous sextet by Henry Leslie, "Charm Me Asleep," by Miss George, Miss Anna Moore, A. E. and Thomas Nowlan, and Mr. Pasmore, will complete the vocal numbers. Mary, Susan and Dorothy Pasmore will contribute the Beethoven trio, op. 1, No. 1 (complete), a popular air arranged by Mr. Pasmore, and two Hungarian dances by Brahms. Mary's solo will be the ninth concerto by De Beriot, and Dorothy's the Gondolier song in G minor by Mendelssohn and the popular gavotte by Popper.

AN EARTHLY PARADISE.

Like Tartarin to the Alps, from a faraway land there arrived a Tourist. He had heard much of the city on the western coast, and as he was collecting data for a work on Freak Governments he could not, without leaving his opus incomplete, pass this western city by. As he landed his ears were greeted by the harmonic strains of a stringed orchestra. "Home again, home again, from a foreign shore," they said to him and his heart was stirred. Then, as he passed through a row of cabmen a chorus of musical tongues burst forth, "Have a cab, sir? Cab sir? This way, sir, to a cab."

But instead of the ordinary shrill cry of the insistent cabby, these simple lines were sung in tenor, baritone or bass voices, with full regard to the pitch, and in measure that suggested the opening chorus of an opera.

Feeling as if he were in a dream, the Tourist was approached by a transfer clerk.

"Baggage, sir; check, sir; shall I take your grip, sir?"

This, too, was recited in musical phrases, and the Tourist noticed that the transfer clerk was accompanied by a small boy who was strumming chords on a banjo in perfect time with the other's song.

"Paper, sir? Call, Chronicle, Examiner, all the weekly papers!"

A newsboy sang in a charming childish treble, to the accompaniment of a mandolin that did not interfere with his solicitation.

"I must be crazy, or else that last cocktail I took was doped," thought the Tourist, hastily boarding a car. Here his dreamy feeling did not diminish, for "Fare, please," was sung in a deep bass voice and "Change" had the same musical inflection.

Arrived at his hotel, where a band was playing "Welcome, Pretty Primrose" in the courtyard, the clerk sang his orders to a bellboy who replied in a falsetto. The Tourist finally fell asleep, after a dinner eaten to the strains of the classical composers. His dreams were disturbed by visions of operas he had seen, and he found himself saying, "Please give me my key" to the bellboy his pressing of a button had summoned to his bedside.

"Key, sir? Certainly, major or minor?"

Then he awoke. It was the same thing as before, the musical routine. Nobody talked. Everybody sang. He called at several offices, was treated at more than one bar, and everywhere found the same monotonous music, music everywhere. By night he found himself, to keep from being so conspicuous, brushing up his baritone and replying to questions or giving orders in rhythm like the rest. At the end of the week he had grown so used to singing that he had forgotten how to talk in one tone. He even invested in a flute, that he might vary his monologues with tonal effects. And when he finished his travels and issued his great book, one of the chapters began:

"The greatest city on earth is on the shores of the western sea. Its inhabitants are the incarnation of Melody. They live in Music. They eat Symphonies, drink Harmonies, and walk whole Operas. They have Musical Comedies for breakfast and Hungarian Czardas for dinner. Their Mayor is an Orches-

OUR OPINION

The Supreme Court

The impending contest over the Chief Justiceship of the Supreme Court of this State is exciting almost as much interest as the row in the Republican party which threatens to develop some influential bolters after the nomination for Governor is made. The judicial contest is of less importance to politicians than the fight over the gubernatorial job because it involves no patronage. But it is not less acrimonious and therefore it is somewhat unusual. It is generally known that there is a bitter hatred between Chief Justice Beatty, who hopes to be renominated, and Justice Garoutte who is eager to succeed Beatty. It is rather surprising that two distinguished jurists, members of the same august tribunal, should, in the ordinary course of judicial business, develop such antipathy for each other. It is unfortunate that they should be on the same bench. When two judges hate each other so cordially that it would be repugnant to either to agree with the other, then it is difficult for litigants to get justice. And according to well-foundel rumor there is that degree of antipathy existing between Justices Beatty and Garoutte. Both are good men, and they are learned in the law, and it is most unfortunate that, in such an exalted position as the one they occupy, they should permit themselves to be influenced by passions that would reflect discredit on the magistrates of the Police Court. But if both are to be contestants for the Chief Justiceship one must lose, and the personnel of the court will change. Some of the timber in the Republican party that is regarded by the push politicians as available for the prospective vacancy is very bad, and it should be interesting to watch the bosses, and see to what extremes they will go in attempting to foist unworthy men upon the people. It is said that they have in training a judge who made a fairly good record early in his career, and then imagining that he had secured public confidence, switched to the push, and became the most popular representative of that element. So closely identified with it has he become, however, it is hardly likely that the bosses will give him the nomination. He wears the badge of his political fraternity so conspicuously that his unfitness for the bench has become a matter of general comment.

Schmitz Emulating Phelan

It is now generally understood by those familiar with the moss-covered tricks of the politician that Mayor Eugene Schmitz is eager for promotion. He had scarcely warmed the mayor's chair before higher aspirations agitated his breast. The gubernatorial job is now the goal of his ambition. It is a laudable ambition for him to foster, and nobody should find fault with him for nursing the hope of succeeding Governor Gage. But with the fate of ex-Mayor Phelan to guide him, Mayor Schmitz should not rush headlong into the same grievous blunders that were responsible for the undoing of that distinguished reformer. In the case of Mayor Phelan it was demonstrated that a public servant who is at all times trimming sail to catch the political breeze is very likely to forget his duties to the public. It is impossible for a public officer to render conscientious service if his official acts be influenced by cautious consideration of the probable effect on the multitude. Such an official frequently does wrong to subserve his own interests. He is only a degree removed from the crook that takes bribe money. We believe that Mr. Schmitz would serve with greater credit to himself and less damage to the city if he would attend to one job at a time, and keep out of entangling alliances with practical politicians. Beside, the probability is that like Phelan he will ruin his own chances if he constantly reminds people that he is in pursuit of a job. For the job-chaser is suspected of an ulterior motive even when he is doing the right thing. It was Mr. Phelan that set the fashion of speech-making in the mayor's office. He was always ready to take the stump or to be interviewed on any old subject. Mr. Schmitz is showing a disposition to prove that he is as voluble as his predecessor. It's a fatal gift. Moreover, committing type-written speeches to memory consumes a lot of time which a conscientious Mayor might devote to his public duties to the greater glory of himself.

Object to a Requiem Mass

Certain prominent divines of the Church of England are engaged in a warm argument over a question of doctrine. It was recently proposed that a solemn requiem mass be said for Queen Victoria, in St. Matthew's church, Westminster. Whereupon several clergymen sent in vigorous protests to the Bishop of London. They declared that such a mass would be an offence against the laws of the Church of England, as well as of good taste. "That our beloved Queen," wrote one of the clergymen, "should be represented as suffering in purgatory the temporal punishment of sins still in process of gradual atonement, is a painful outrage on her memory, which is offensive in the last degree to loyal English churchmen, and constitutes a violation of church order such as your lordship should surely take cognizance of." But the Bishop of London is not quite sure that the statements of the protestants are well founded. He disclaims the purpose of the mass to be to liberate Queen Victoria from purgatory. But a requiem mass is what its name implies—an offering of the Eucharist for the repose of the soul for whom it is celebrated. It is of course borrowed from the Catholic church, and therefore it is distasteful to those representatives of the Church of England who affect a belief in the doctrines of the Catholic church while asserting a freedom from Papal influence. But Churchmen should not quarrel over such matters. In such cases, the dead should be given the benefit of the doubt. Perhaps, if Queen Victoria could be consulted she would not deprecate the notion of a requiem mass. Though she was a woman of virtue it has never been suggested that she should be canonized. If she ever worried over the question of the existence of purgatory, she undoubtedly felt that she would be pretty lucky if she could include it in her itinerary after leaving the throne. To suggest that a departed soul is in purgatory is a fine compliment to the deceased, for it implies a pure life full of good deeds.

The Old Familiar Subject

The Divorce Problem is the topic chosen for discussion in the latest of the Mirror pamphlets, and Mr. Reedy, like others who have attempted to settle the question, treats the matter as though only the husbands and wives, and that other outer circle, "the community," had any concern in the matter. He assumes that the primary object of matrimony is to secure the happiness of men and women as individuals, and that when a venture has not come out according to the preconceived ideas of the contracting parties they are entitled to "tries over," as the children provide for in their games. Mr. Reedy offers no new suggestions, and no new views of the old arguments, but goes over the ground of the hardships suffered by those who find that mates are not necessarily matches, whatever be the cause, slight or stupendous, for the disagreement. There is no reason for assuming that where divorces are granted for trivial causes—that is to say, trivial to the onlooker—the sum of human happiness is increased. Many a woman who thought her heart was broken because No. 1 kicked her pug dog, has submitted in silence when his successor has lavished similar attentions on herself. Many a woman who has regarded her husband's earnings only in the light of prospective gowns and bonnets, has been thankful later on when she had the certainty of a square meal before her. But in this whole discussion of the question, no matter by whom or from what viewpoint, the children are lost sight of or ignored. When one comes down to bottom facts, it makes no difference what the modern woman, the new woman, the club woman, or whatever else she choses to call herself, sets up as a theory of marriage, the real fact of the matter is that the institution was designed for the propagation of the race, and so long as the welfare of the offspring is conserved it makes little difference to nature whether mamma has been able to persuade papa that they ought to keep a carriage, or whether papa always has his dinners served to his liking and household expenses kept down. The birds build their nests and the beasts make their lairs that their young may be maintained in some degree of comfort until they are able to care for themselves. Usually this is accomplished in a single season, and the parents have no further responsibility for their broods. Among the lower forms of life the parents have fulfilled their destiny when they have brought forth their young. The progeny of the human race is the most helpless of all created beings. Children not only need more care, but they need it for an infinitely longer period than do other creatures, and the home should be maintained with an eye to their proper upbringing. But the children of divorced parents are the last of the menage which are considered. It is true that they are frequently made a bone of contention and dragged back and forth through all the scandal of legal squabbles, neither parent willing to give up to the other; and it is also unfortunately true that, having served the purpose of furnishing something to quarrel about, the same children are not infrequently abandoned by both parents and left to grow up as best they may. Time was when people considered it a reproach that even orphan children should be sent to an asylum while they had relatives able to furnish them with shelter; but now we have homes and schools and associations of all kinds whose doors are open not only to those whom death has orphaned, but to those whom the law has deprived of parents. It is not in human nature that step-parents should have the same consideration for the children of others that they have for their own, and even when the little intruders are not treated harshly they are at best regarded with indifferent tolerance. They have no rights and few privileges, and they soon drift out of the uncongenial atmosphere of a house which is no home, to make their way in the world, up or down. No one who takes even a passing interest in the tragedies of childhood can fail to have noticed how often girls of tender years, found straying in bypaths, and boys whose short legs will not reach the floor when they are seated in the prisoners' dock, are the offspring of divorced parents. This is not a question of poverty or riches. The fortunate ones who can square their cases or keep the reports out of the papers are every bit as numerous as their brothers in misfortune. Even when nothing of this kind occurs, there is the flippant, inconsequent attitude which the young people assume, and which in time leads to indifference on their own part to any perpetuation of the marriage. Where divorce was once regarded in the same light as amputation—as a last resort—and not to be considered while there was any other hope, now it is kept in readiness as a "family medicine," and the children are permitted to help themselves. It is no infrequent thing to find families who have had divorces for three generations, and intermarriages with divorces until the family relations are as mixed as an oldfashioned hit-and-miss rag carpet. Mr. Reedy is undoubtedly correct in saying that marriage is too easy, and that public opinion is the cure for divorce; but how is he going to restrict marriage when he promulgates the doctrine that divorce should be made as easy as possible, and divorcees are entitled to as many turns as they can get? It is useless, and worse than useless, to expect that a community made up of divorced people, as we are fast getting to be, will make any outcry against what pleases them. The churches apparently dare not offend their congregations, made up in large part of people who have been through the mill. Laws would be useless when lawyers busy themselves in finding loopholes by which their spirit may be evaded. Making it easy to get out of a scrape is not the way to discourage people from getting into one. Divorces should not be easy to obtain, and the fact that marriage is "for keeps" would go further towards inducing some forethought and consideration before entering upon it, than the easy, happy-go-lucky notion that, as Dundreary used to say, "if you don't like it you can go home to your mother." Divorces should not be granted on frivolous grounds or by default, which is in nine cases out of ten another term for collusion, nor should some nominal charge be made to hide a more serious one. Closed doors, so far as the public is concerned, should be the rule, and salacious details should be kept from the papers. There is too little dignity and solemnity about all of our legal proceedings. They take on too much of the appearance of light comedy and summer picnics. Giddy schoolgirls and idle matrons should be excluded, and proceedings should take on more of the character of a military court. More common sense and less sentiment should be exercised in this matter of breaking up homes and scattering children, and it should be impressed upon the dissatisfied that when they promised to abide by each other "for better, for worse," there was no guarantee that there would be no "worse." Sir Francis Jeune has set an excellent example in the case now before him, the application of the infatuated idiot, Florence Jewell, who a few years ago insisted on marrying a South African savage. Now she is seeking separation and tells a pitiful tale of beatings, stabbings and other cruelty. Sir Francis very pertinently asked her if that were not a reasonable expectation in the case. People have no right to call upon the law to extricate them from the consequences of their deliberate blunders. The harder it is made for them to get out of the net, the more hope there is that those who see the struggles will themselves either stay out of similar entanglements or make reasonable examination before they venture in.

The Saunterer

Her Fast Day Luncheons

Mrs. Eleanor Martin's Wednesday luncheons during Lent have provoked a deal of criticism in church circles. Mrs. Martin is a communicant of the Catholic church and as such she knows that Wednesdays are Fast days in Lent. Yet she selected that day for the regaling of some of our smartest people. Of course I know that when a lady has attained the age of Mrs. Martin she is not obliged to comply strictly with the rules of the Lenten season, but she should not encourage younger folks to commit sin. She has been severely condemned for her conduct by strict Catholics who declare that she has been guilty of promoting scandal, for she has not only wilfully violated the laws of her church but she has given publicity to the fact through the press. They contend that when a woman of her high social position manifests a contempt for the laws of the church she is responsible for a great deal of harm. And I have heard it suggested that she should either refrain from giving luncheons on Fast days or cease to pose as a member of the Roman Catholic church.

A Resourceful Press Agent

Mr. George Bowles is at his old tricks again. Mr. George Bowles, be it known, is the press representative of Blanche Walsh, the clever actress, who first came to us heralded as the daughter of "Fatty" Walsh of New York, and who was the first of her profession to pronounce this a "jay-town." Others have said the same thing since but they were plagiarists, pure and simple, for it was the talented Blanche, piqued at being unappreciated by us in "Aristocracy," that first called us jay. It is Mr. Bowles, however, or rather his genius for exploiting theatrical stars, that I wish to discuss. No other press agent in the business has such a happy faculty for getting his star talked about. When I read in the dailies that Blanche Walsh was coming, and that there was some likelihood of Melbourne McDowell jumping over the footlights some night and carrying her off to nervous music, I suspected that George Bowles was in town. I was quite sure that no other press agent could have invented such a good story to give impetus to the advance sale. I was equally positive that none but Bowles could have "worked" the dailies for such valuable free advertising. And sure enough Bowles was here, and you can depend upon it that Blanche Walsh will enjoy a successful season. If ever I decide to go on the lecture platform I shall want George Bowles for a press agent.

His Anna Held Yarns

It was Bowles, by the way, who worked up our interest in Anna Held some years ago. He told the papers she took a milk bath every day, and that there was only one brand of lacteal fluid that she used—the brand that goats have copyrighted. And to make his story good he advertised for a supply of goats' milk to be delivered to Anna Held at the Baldwin hotel. It made a big hit and so did Anna with her eloquent hips. Later on he chartered an engine to send her to Ingleside to play the last race on Tod Sloan's tip. Years ago he used to boom Dave Henderson's extravaganza shows in the same way, and for a season he kept Alice Neilson in the glare of the calcium. He's an original chap, is Bowles, and he scorns those stock stories about stolen diamonds. He was a reporter once and he knows the sort of yarns that appeals to newspaper men.

The Fickle Actor

The story of McDowell's mad and unrequited passion for Blanche Walsh is really a thrilling one. It's so good that I should advise both stars to give it vraisemblance, and get all the advertising out of it that it is capable of yielding. What a sensation the muscular McDowell would create were he to spring over the footlights some night and give us the realistic tableau that has been suggested! But I am constrained to explode the story. The fact is that Cupid plays only one-night stands in the gay actor's heart. His passion is not the fierce, unquenchable flame that poets sing about. The thespian was a sailor in his younger days, and while roving the seas he acquired that sweetheart-in-every-port habit. His affections are evanescent. He was married when the voluptuous Fanny Davenport first made goo-goo eyes at him. He got a divorce to marry Fanny, and in those days it was current gossip in the profession that the wealthy actress placated the wife with a good, round sum. And since declaring his love for Blanche Walsh, he has become an ardent admirer of Florence Stone, his present leading woman. He met her at the Grand when he came to this city last season. That was immediately after his separation from Miss Walsh, so it is evident that unrequited love has not been bothering him much. So long as Melbourne McDowell has a handsome leading lady to play with he will not pine away over an actress in another company who is "wedded to her art."

The Latest Political Blunder

Governor Gage blundered in appointing a harbor commissioner to succeed Rudolph Herold. He should have permitted the Democrat to hold office until after the adjournment of the State convention. Now that the Republican party is in complete control of the water front patronage, the Gage machine will be expected to create vacancies for hungry politicians all over the State. Handling patronage on the eve of a State convention is dangerous business. It is bound to engender soreness, and the Gage machine cannot afford to make any more enemies. It is having trouble enough now. I wonder if it was that sagacious politician, Colonel Dan Burns, who advised this latest blunder.

The most delightfully blended whisky known to the human palate is "Jesse Moore"—the standard for over fifty years.

The Fear of Budd

Ex-Governor Jim Budd has returned from Washington where he was exerting his influence in favor of the Chinese Exclusion bill. Budd is causing much uneasiness among the Republican leaders. The fear that he may be prevailed upon to run for Governor again is haunting them day and night. They acknowledge that he is the man in the Democratic party who is capable of making Henry T. Gage look like three dimes in a race for the gubernatorial job, and though he assures them that he is quite content with private life they are afraid that if a convention stampeded for him in a burst of enthusiasm such as might be aroused by the mention of his name, he could not refuse to become the standard bearer of the party that has done so much for him. But Jim Budd actually believes that he would shorten his life by taking the helm of State again, and I know that he has no desire to do that. It must afford him considerable satisfaction, however, to know that he is the only man who ever served as Governor of California who was ever looked upon as an available candidate for re-election.

She will Visit her Sister

After an absence of several years Gertrude Atherton is to visit her old home. She is expected this week. While in San Francisco she will be the guest of her sister, Mrs. Ashton Stevens. Mrs. Atherton has gained all sorts of honors since she shook the dust of her native State from her shapely feet. It was only a few weeks ago that Zangwill, in discussing the women authors who deserve a permanent place in literature, said of Gertrude Atherton that she is the greatest American novelist of her sex. This must have delighted the heart of Ambrose Bierce who, when others were decrying Mrs. Atherton's worth, always asserted her genius. Bierce takes credit to himself for the "discovery" of Gertrude Atherton. When she first published, by the way, she signed herself Gertrude Franklin Atherton, but later dropped the middle name. She was very fond of her mother's father, Stephen Franklin, whence came that part of her signature.

Her Contribution to Book Lore

Though "The Randolphs of Redwoods" that appeared serially in the Argonaut, was Mrs. Atherton's first published novel, no one knew it was her work until years after. The story is called, since it appeared in book form, "A Daughter of the Vine." It is by no means its author's best literary effort. Its interest lies in the fact that its chapters tell a true story, the characters being all known to early Californians. "What Dreams May Come" and "Hermia Suydam" brought a storm of alternate praise and censure about their author's ears, Mrs. Atherton being generally condemned for her unvarnished erotics. She was in advance of her time. Her early works are tame compared with the warm-toned novels that art turned out nowadays in bushels. "Patience Sparhawk" is one of Mrs. Atherton's greatest books, in my opinion. It is a work of genius. Some writers go backward in their writings: Mrs. Atherton is constantly going forward. Her latest book, "The Conqueror," which is a life of Alexander Hamilton, involved any amount of historical research from which however its author did not shrink. She went about it with the same painstaking care that she gave to her series of articles, some years ago in the Examiner, on California before the Gringoes came.

Family Connections

Mrs. Stevens, who was Alcece Uhlhorn, is Mrs. Atherton's favorite sister. Another sister, Daisy, is Mrs. Eugene Deuprey. The Uhlhorn girls are only half-sisters of Mrs. Atherton, whose father was Mr. Tom Horne. Her mother was married twice. The family was very prominent here in early days. Mr. Franklin, the grandfather of Mrs. Atherton, Mrs. Stevens and Mrs. Deuprey, was a pillar of Dr. Scott's Presbyterian church, and for years held a responsible position in the Bank of California. Mrs. Uhlhorn was a beautiful woman and her beauty descended to all her daughters. Mrs. Atherton is the fairest of blondes and it was the natural golden tinge of her hair that led Ella Wheeler Wilcox, the ashen blonde, into a controversy with her sister writer, that gave the press of two sides of the continent so much material a good many years ago.

Irvine's Philosophy of Booz

Leigh Irvine, the novelist and well-known journalist of San Francisco, is quite a wit. He is pronounced against teetotalism. Some of Irvine's sayings are worth recording. These, for instance:

Daniel Webster's last words were: "I still live." The nurse had been told by the doctor to give him whisky as long as his heart beat. Fearing that the nurse mistook his quiet for death, he informed her that he survived.

There are no microbes in whisky. Whisky kills microbes, whips up circulation, and gives prohibitionists and preachers a job.

For over half a century "Jesse Moore" Whisky has held its supremacy as the best, purest and most palatable.

Restaurateur Dennett, the seller of Java and doughnuts, failed the other day, because he did not let his customers take a drink once in a while. Grub doesn't mix with teetotalism.

Our Old Missions

The Landmarks' club has acquired possession of the Pala Mission church and graveyard, and will now proceed to the work of restoration. This is a step in the right direction, and one that has been too long delayed. The people of the Pacific coast have been dilatory, to say the least, in taking steps toward the preservation of historic monuments, and it will be but a few years before the remnants of the Mission buildings will totally disappear, unless something more than talk is done towards their protection. From time to time there is a flutter of interest, but it never lasts long enough to accomplish anything, while the elements work ceaselessly if imperceptibly at the destruction and obliteration of what is left of one of the most important enterprises ever undertaken on the continent of America. The missionaries were their own architects, and they had neither means to purchase, nor skilled workmen to direct. They worked with the material at hand, teaching and directing the savages who had not advanced even to the degree of civilization which demanded a breech clout. When the bicycle was in the height of its popularity, and "good roads" was a fad or a political issue, there was some talk of repairing and reopening the "camino real," the road followed by the missionaries in their settlement, and restoring the old buildings as an inducement for tourists, but the bicycle fell into disfavor and the project appears to have been abandoned. If the matter were one which concerned the Pilgrims, there would have been a bill put through Congress and in all likelihood some kind of a national protectorate established. Such monuments as we have on the Pacific coast do not compare in antiquity with those of the older settled portions of the country, but the Massachusetts and Pennsylvania wonders are things of yesterday beside those of Europe. It ought to be a matter of interest to the whole United States to have the Missions of California preserved and restored. It does not reflect credit on our State pride that we have done nothing but talk.

Now for His Church

Rev. Father P. Brady is giving wide publicity to the fact that he is soon to add a church to the parochial residence on the west side of St. Mary's avenue near Mission street. Judging from the picture which has appeared in all the dailies the church is to be a handsome edifice. Father Brady has distinguished himself by providing a home for himself first and erecting a church for his parishioners later on. I have been told that it was his innate hospitality that impelled him to reverse the usual order of things.

Why there is a Breach

A scene not on the bill was enacted at the Women's Exchange the other day. It was during the lunch hour when the dining room was packed with the ladies of swelldom, indulging themselves in tea et cetera between shops. All at once there was a terrific howl, and the lunchers sprang upon chairs, revealing glimpses of gay hosiery and beflounced petticoats. A fight between a cat and a dog was in progress. It seems the fashionable milliner next door owns a highbred cat that has a liking for the good things of life, especially those concocted by the Women's Exchange cooks. Every day at the noon hour Mademoiselle Mon Chat paws her way into the Exchange, is regaled with dainty bits and is not chided for her epicurean desires. But the other day she met the Exchange dog, and the latter's hostility led to the scene recorded. There is bad blood now, I hear, between the fashionable milliner and the manager of the Exchange, but the dog and cat have not repeated their battle.

It Impressed Him

The press dispatches tell us that "Arizona" has made a big hit in London, and that a prominent divine who attended a performance the other night declared that it was a great play, and that it impressed him very much. I shouldn't be surprised to learn that what impressed the clergyman more than all else was the utterance of Tony, the Mexican—"Down to hell from the bottom of my soul I love you." That's a great line for melodramatic effect.

Bathing for an Ad

It is the lack of sectional patriotism which has held back the northern counties of California from the material advance gained by the south. The people of the north are not willing to sacrifice themselves no matter how slightly to further the forwarding of their district. Only a few weeks ago the residents of San Diego went through their annual bath in the surf to permit pictures to be made for distribution in the East, showing the mildness of the winters in San Diego. Over fifty of the most public-spirited of the San Diegans donned decollete suits and after thoroughly fortifying themselves with warm drinks, stood on the beach for several minutes. All were tenderly cared for afterward and no fatalities have been reported from their exposure.

But He's Earning an Honest Living

There is a little cigar stand at the head of Vallejo street wharf and few know, outside of the boatmen and denizens of the vicinage, that "Jimmy" Page—"Dapper Jimmy" Page—as some used to call him, once District Attorney of San Francisco, is the little broken down man who reaps the meagre livelihood that its counter offers. The time that he spent in San Quentin for the theft of a madman's money is marked upon his face. What is his legal learning to him now? Good name, profession, family and all went with the step that carried him across the line that marks the division between honesty and crime. Here is a man who had every chance in the world. He was elected to one of the most important offices in the gift of the municipality. He was popular and he appeared to be destined for political preferment, but the primrose path lured his footsteps and he fell. But Jim Page is making a manly struggle for social rehabilitation, and I hope that he is not forgotten by men about town who were proud of his companionship a few short years ago.

Hearst's Rival Exchange

The condemnation of the so-called yellow journals, following the assassination of President McKinley, and which was directed most bitterly against the Examiner, is serving a purpose, but not the one intended. The Merchant's Exchange, for years the only disseminator of shipping news, and the bureau which had furnished all of the Pacific Coast with that important feature of their commercial pages, made itself ridiculous by expressing its deprecation of Mr. Hearst and his publications and by withdrawing its service and excluding the Examiner from its files. Similar action was taken in nearly every port in the country of sufficient consequence to have a bureau of that kind. Hearst didn't care a snap of his fingers for the exclusion of his papers from the files of the exchanges, for he knew that the merchants would read them anyway, but he had to have shipping reports. To collect these independently was a stupendous task, but the thought of revenge moved him as it has the majority of human kind since the beginning. He started an opposition service. It, of course, has not reached a state of perfection yet, but the competition has roused the mercantile organization from its '49 ways of doing things and subscribers are getting a service that some of them only dreamed of as a reality of the millennium. So Hearst is having his revenge, the merchants have to read his papers and between the Examiner and their own exchange they are getting more than they pay for.

The Mailed Cuff

The latest thing in missives is the mailed cuff. We have heard of the mailed hand in war and now we have the mailed cuff in correspondence. Who started the fad is a bit of history which has not survived, but doubtless it was some one who, for want of a sheet of paper or a postal card, took off his cuff, wrote a message upon it, addressed it, put a stamp upon it and dropped it in a mail box. Doubtless the person receiving this strange epistle told of it to others, and they, thinking it a clever stroke, did likewise. Now it is a craze, and if you are a society bud or a society man and do not get a cuff with your morning roll, you are not in it strictly. The Postmaster General says there is no law against mailing cuffs, or any other article for the matter of that, and that two cents is the postage. Of course it would be much more au fait, if the sender should ascertain the number worn by the intended recipient, and send the right size, and follow up with the fellow. It must be remembered that it is not proper to send dickeys, collars, shirt waists, or socks—that only the linen cuff is accepted good form in the West.

Lord Temple cigars are smoked by all clubmen who will take nothing but the best.

Japan is the objective point of any number of society tourists these days. A party in charge of Anthony E. Kaeser sailed on the America Maru yesterday, among them Mrs. E. A. Judson, Misses Pearl and Charlotte Judson, Mrs. Teckla Stein-Reuter, Mr. and Mrs. Crosby Wright.

Conspicuous by their Absence

The original Irish of San Francisco have come to the conclusion that in order to command the respect and sympathy of the world, they must resent jokes at their expense, insist upon being taken seriously, and familiarize themselves with the Gaelic tongue. If they succeed in diverting the current of popular humor the professional jokesmith will suffer irksome restraint and find himself hard pressed for material. And by the time they shall have abandoned the Queen's English, the philosophers of the Dooley school will have retired from business, for the rich Celtic brogue will be a thing of the past. Last Monday the sons of old Ireland appeared to be more in earnest than ever before on St. Patrick's Day. The professional job-chasers, who have hitherto ben conspicuous in affairs in honor of Erin's patron saint, were not in the foreground. If the organized Irish have resolved to no longer aid and abet the professional politicians who, from time immemorial, have appealed to the Irish vote by pumping hot air into the Irish ear on St. Patrick's Day, then they have accomplished something toward winning respect and sympathy. Caricatures of the Irish should be regarded by them as less offensive than insults to their intelligence, such as they were accustomed to swallow when job-chasers succeeded, by artful wire-pulling, in getting their names on St. Patrick's Day programs, not through sympathy with the Irish cause, but in hope of pulling the Celtic leg.

A Sensational Resolution

One of the resolutions adopted at the St. Patrick's Day celebration Monday night occasioned some surprise and comment. It was the one viewing with distrust the action of the Catholic University in Washington in removing Dr. Henebry from the Gaelic chair. There were several Catholic priests on the platform when the resolution was adopted, and yet there was not a dissenting voice. Archbishop Riordan of this city is one of the trustees of the university. The acquiescence of Father Scanlan and others was therefore surprising. The Ancient Order of Hibernians endowed the Gaelic chair with fifty thousand dollars, expecting it to be filled by Dr. Henebry, and now it is said to be filled by a man unfamiliar with the language. Father Yorke is leading the fight for the restoration of Henebry.

He's After Oil Now

Peter Martin is devoting nearly all his time to oil these days. He is an officer of a Texas oil company, and he expects to make a strike that will enable him to put up the dot that he had expected his fond mamma to supply. Peter is really very much in love and so is his fiancee, too, though one hears very little gossip about their engagement these lively Lenten days. But the engagement has not been broken as the prophets predicted, and there is still a prospect of the marriage taking place even though Mrs. Martin fail to loosen up.

Illness of Mrs. Duval

Agnes Tobin and "little" Joe Tobin are speeding to England, where Mrs. Raoul-Duval will be operated upon for appendicitis. The news of her illness has varnished anew the picture she made as a bride—a vision that will never be cobwebbed in the memory of the wdddings guests. It is the thing to ooze polite ecstacies over every bride's looks, but there were no insincerities sprinkled on Beatrice Tobin. The wedding was solemnized in the private chapel in the Tobin residence, and when Beatrice and her gallant Frenchman knelt down before the Archbishop, the sun falling full on the high-stained glass windows reflected its warm colors on the bride. She might have been the Madeline of Keats' "St. Agnes Eve." The earnest hope of her many friends is that the young mother will soon be restored to health.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co are most effective.

An Industrious Family

Although the wedding of Emma Meyer and Lieutenant George Henry Richardson was a quiet home affair, never was a mansion turned into such a bower of bloom. Lieutenant Richardson is stationed at Fort Apache, Arizona, where nothing but cacti thrives, and the exquisite floral touches at the wedding will be a fragrant remembrance to carry down to the desert. Miss Fecheimer, whose deft fingers carried out the clever scheme of decoration, is another bachelor girl who has proved that girls accustomed to luxury can sometimes butter their bread without the aid of the needle, primer, pen, or paint brush. The Fecheimer girls have taken poverty by the horns and are proving their worth. The two younger girls are at the Children's hospital, studying to become trained nurses, and Miss Fecheimer, after only six months in the decorative field, finds herself, and deservedly so, in the front rank of decorators.

Crocketts Raising the Wind

The Crocketts have rented both their California street house and their Burlingame place. The supposition is that sundry fat fees Mr. Crockett expected have not fallen his way since he reharnessed himself for the engineering profession. However, when Caro, only daughter of the house of Crockett, married Laurance Scott, she feathered herself a nest that ought to suffice however rude the shocks to the parental roof. Caro Crockett was left some fifty thousand dollars by her Grandmamma Mills, but I believe the money was not very wisely invested by Crockett pere.

"Rushed" Say the Gossips

The Laurance Scotts will summer Menlowards, and later will probably be forced into building their own home since the Crocketts have leased their Lares and Penates. Although Mrs. Henry Scott certainly did her diplomatic best to bring about that match there is no doubt of the young couple's devotion. When their engagement was announced it was planned that the wedding should not take place for some months. But he marriage followed closely on the engagement and Mr. Crockett's "resignation" from the gas company tagged the wedding festivities. Mrs. Grundy hinted in stage whispers that the Crocketts had rushed the wedding as soon as they felt that Mr. Crockett would be squeezed out of the gas company. Whether or no they were married in haste, they are certainly not repenting at leisure. Caro is so engrossed in her husband that she is no longer counted one of the "old guard." With Mary Scott-Martin away and Mary Crocker-Harrison living in New York, the Hopkins-Taylors are the only members of that little coterie still faithful to the old haunts.

Livernash Scores a Hit

Judging from the reports that are coming this way from Washington, Mr. E. J. Livernash has made a deep impression on the statesmen at the Nation's capital. Mr. Livernash went to Washington to lead and direct the fight for the Exclusion bill, and it was not long before he was accorded deferential recognition. Livernash is a genius. His mind is a wonderful storehouse of information, and his reasoning powers are of the keenest variety. Though he makes no pretentions to oratorical ability he is a remarkably fluent and entertaining speaker, a fact which was attested by the Senate Committee, which listened to him four hours without interruption. No other speaker on the subject of Chinese immigration was permitted to talk longer than twenty minutes. He has been consulted by the members of both Houses in reference to every measure and amendment affecting the Chinese, and it is acknowledged that no member of Congress has been able to cope with him in debate on matters pertaining to exclusion. Livernash is a licensed attorney, and he has displayed his legal ability in more than one important case, but journalism is his chosen profession, and he is one of the ablest men on W. R. Hearst's pay-roll.

Now a Leading Lady

Pretty Mary Forbes, who only a few months ago made her debut on the stage with the Neill company, is to play the leading part next year in "Barbara Freitchie." Mrs. Neill has been playing Barbara, but Mrs. Neill is getting a trifle old for such roles. When the Neil company put on the Maryland drama here some months ago, although Mrs. Neill won merited applause by her charming portrayal of the Frederick maiden, yet the part was too exacting for her, and she and her manager husband, James Neill, have wisely prepared Miss Forbes to succeed her. Miss Forbes is the daughter of Professor Charles Forbes, who accupies the chemistry chair at Columbia university. He is the inventor of the Eastman dry plate, known to all photographers. She is a niece of Mrs. Neill, and will be remembered as a tall willowy blonde of the Gibson type. When last here she was very raw in her acting, but is said to have improved considerably.

Merely Perhaps

Ever since I told the story of the luring of Northrop Cowles into marital bonds, the domestic affairs of that popular club man have been the subject of comment both in New York and this city. In view of the circumstances surrounding the marriage the short cut taken by Marie Zane from the altar to the divorce court should not have excited so much wonder and speculation as the gossips have indulged. The divorce case was settled up more expeditiously than the wedding itself, but that sort of thing has happened before. People have arranged plans for their divorce even before marriage. It would not surprise me to learn that Northrop Cowles' consent to marriage was given in consideration of Marie Zane's promise to sue for a divorce.

A Question of Dollars

Little Ethel's hair is rather thin, and it is the trial of her life for she goes to school where most of the tiny maids have long curls or braids. The other day her father came home with the news that his partner's wife had presented him with a baby girl with a fine head of hair.

"How much did they have to pay for her?" asked Ethel.

"Oh, about twenty dollars."

"Well," observed Ethel, after some deliberation, "if you had given one or two dollars more for me I might have had long hair."

That evening Ethel was watching her aunt, who was brushing out her long and heavy tresses, when she suddenly said:

"They must have paid quite a sum of money for you."

The New President

It shows how conservative all women are, at bottom, that after all the talk the California club finally elected the regular ticket. There were some very good women elected, too, but I am not quite sure that harmony has been restored. Mrs. George Law Smith, the new president, is a born organizer with not a lazy bone in her body, but she has not the reputation of being a peace-maker. She was at the head of a faction that caused Sorosis to writhe for months in the throes of internal disorder. But evidently she has the confidence of the California club.

Among the Directors

There are some charming women on the new directorate. Mrs. C. C. Burr is a most gracious and cultured woman and belongs to one of California's old families. Her husband's father was E. C. Burr, one of the first mayors of San Francisco. Mrs. Burr, while she believes in the advance of woman and all that sort of thing, is distinctly feminine. She loves her home and delights to entertain her friends there. She has two sons, both married, and a married daughter, Mrs. Julian Holman. Mrs. W. S. Leake is the wife of the Call's editorial manager. She, also, is a lover of home and family, but believes in women's clubs because of their opportunities for mental culture. Mrs. Thomas Magee, Sr., is one of the youngest members of the club, but she is quite able to hold her own among the more matured minds. She has no end of tact, and if there are any differences of opinion among the directors she is the one to smooth matters out. Mrs. Magee was Helen Curtis, it will be remembered, and is a sister of Mrs. Denis O'Sullivan. She is a great friend of Mrs. Law Smith's daughter Maude, whose schoolmate she was.

The Wickedest Man in Paris

Sarah Bernhardt has broken another man's heart. The story was told in the despatches the other day. She agreed to produce a new play written by Catulle Mendes, and it appears that they had a row and that the poet has confessed that he was in love with the aged actress. But Catulle Mendes is no longer a young man. It is evident from the story of his affair with Bernhardt, however, that he is the same eccentric genius that he was in his young days when he was known as the wickedest man in Paris. Now he is flirting with the ghosts of old days, a little visionary mourning for dead sins and faded sensations. Catulle Mendes is one of the weird decadents of Paris, an ideal lover for the unusual Sarah. In his youth he was gay and cynical, and he wrote in strange metres and odd rhythms, and his favorite theme was kisses. He was king of the dreaming youngsters of Paris, and he was a perpetual founder of magazines, journals and newspapers. In twenty years he has founded twenty papers, no one of which has survived. But, according to the despatches of Sunday last, he has written a play which promises to keep alive his fame as a writer.

Published His Own Infidelity

Mendes had many love affairs in his time, and it is amusing to read of his complaint of the fickleness of the divine Sarah, in view of his record in the game of hearts. A short time ago Vance Thompson published a charming volume entitled "French Portraits" that contains a sketch of Catulle Mendes. It is interesting at this time, in view of the latest sensation in Parisian theatrical circles. Thompson relates that when Mendes was young he married Judith Gautier, a poet, a woman of genius. They quarreled and one day Mendes wrote in his paper an "Avis" to the public. It was full of sneering, triumphant avowals of his infidelity. He threw the paper at his wife, saying, "Here is Madame Mendes' opportunity." She took advantage of the opportunity, and obtained a divorce. Mendes married again —Augusta Holmes and many others.

His Influence on Literature

Jules Lemaitre said of Mendes, "Were I a Christian, I would vehemently curse his works and pray God the while for his soul; and were I a legislator I would banish him beyond the frontiers of the Republic, crowded with the faded roses of his last nocturnal debauch." Yet Catulle Mendes has created a mode that attended and influenced all the poets of his generation. Vance Thompson declares him to be "the most accomplished man of letters living—master of all the artifices and secrets of literature, and in all his books there are only a half-dozen pages that the world will not willingly let die." Yes; Catulle Mendes was once the wickedest man in Paris. But with the increase of his waist-line has come virtue.

Beale's Story on McCreery

The late General E. F. Beale was a great raconteur. He always told his stories well besides having, as a rule, something to say worth listening to. One story that he recited with much relish was to the effect that during a visit to Paris he, Judge Pratt and Mr. Andrew McCreery met one evening in a restaurant. It was just after McCreery made so much money in stocks and on the occasion of his first visit abroad. When the three men compared notes, it proved they were all on the eve of departure from that gay capital. "I," said General Beale, "was going to London en route home to the United States; Judge Pratt said he was booked for Berlin, and when I asked McCreery where he was bound, he replied he was going to Rome by way of Spain. I told him he could not do that—go to Italy by way of Spain. 'Can't, eh, and why not, I'd like to know?' I said, 'Man alive, Spain's a peninsula.' 'A what?' said McCreery. 'A peninsula,' I replied. McCreery thought a moment and then said, 'The devil it is; now I always thought Spain was a monarchy.'"

The Haggins in Smartdom

The youthful wife of the millionaire turfman and erstwhile Californian J. B. Haggin is the only member of her very large family connection to evidence a desire for ultra fashionable life. She is said to have induced the old gentleman to enter the Newport arena and compete with owners of villas in that swagger settlement, in a display of wealth and style. Old Californians who remember the first wife of Mr. Haggin know how averse she was to anything like such a mode of life. Both she and her sister, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, were noted for their domestic tastes and while frequent entertainers in our social world, their functions were of an exclusive order. The younger sister of these ladies was almost adopted by Mrs. Haggin and as Miss Laura Sanders was one of the beauties of the day here. She eventually married a Kentuckian, a gentleman named Voorhees (who is the father of the present Mrs. Haggin), and when the marriage resulted in a divorce, the daughter Pearl was, as her mother before her, taken in charge by her aunt, Mrs. Haggin, who took her abroad, and after that lady's death the charming Miss Pearl became the constant companion of Mr. J. B. Haggin, and finally his wife. Her mother married again and is now the wife of a wealthy Southern banker in Kentucky.

Boardman-Salisbury

Gossip declares that one of the earliest Easter announcements will be the engagement of Danforth Boardman and Miss Salisbury. The young man is one of the most popular beaux of the swim and should the rumor prove true Miss Margaret will be heartily congratulated.

Mrs. Salisbury as Folly

Who, to note the dignified bearing and mincing step of the staid Mrs. Salisbury, who poses as one of the fashionable leaders of the Friday Fortnightlies, would ever dream that the same portly dame once disported among a gay company in cap and bells? But, indeed, she on one occasion appeared at a fancy ball in very abbreviated skirts and the other items that go to make up the costume of Folly, and we are told the tinkling of her bells and the loud laugh which ever accompanies Folly were effectual in clearing the track before her as she progressed through the rooms.

Burns-Dunphy

Few brides have had as many gifts showered upon them as has Miss Rowena Burns, daughter of Colonel "Dan." She and her pearl necklaces and diamonds, together with the mines in Mexico, become Mrs. Charles Dunphy today. And again, while there have been many necklaces and diamond tiaras showered upon brides through the columns of the newspapers, it must be said that few prospective bridegrooms have taken as little advantage of these things as has Charles Dunphy. He is an individual sort of a fellow, is Mr. Dunphy. He likes to stake his own horse and lose his own money and use his own head to think about it—which is good. He likes to mix his own liquor, drink it himself, and afterwards to put his own mummy to bed—which is also good. He likes wedding trips to Europe, which displays good taste, and he is willing to come back and play polo next year, which is heroic; but he will not—that is, he says he'll be damned if he does—he will not, I repeat, go south and manage his father-in-law's mines in Mexico—which latter denial brings him well within the circle of the truly Oriental elite.

His Amusing Ways

And again, Mr. Dunphy is modest. In that centre of esthetic bibulation—the Palace hotel—where born gentlemen can mix drinks with impunity and drink them with prodigality, and be carried off to bed with Petronian ceremony, Mr. Dunphy has displayed great tact in keeping secret the many intricate arrangements of "his match." "I'll tell you what, gentlemen," he would begin, and then stop short. Turning to some of the reporters, who were present on all occasions, he would say, "Now, Williams, I wish you would get out of the range for a little while; I want to talk privately to the boys." If Williams grew irritable he would pat him kindly on the back. "There, old man, don't go off that way," he would urge. "It's about my wedding," he would add; "and some of the fellows will be sure to tell you about it afterwards. If they don't, come back, and I will. It's private, you know, and it has got to get out by mistake."

A Bud to Be

Among the thirty or so buds who will bloom in the society garden next season will be Eugenie Hawes, Mrs. Jack Schroeder's daughter. Miss Hawes, however, is not going to wait until the winter for her first glimpse of social joys. She will give a tea next Monday, chiefly to her young friends and schoolmates, at the Richelieu. She is a very charming girl, and has all her mother's grace and cordiality of manner. She has not been brought up very strictly, and so she has none of the meek convent-maid air. The Schroeders invariably kept open house at their Redwood ranch, and during their stay in the town always entertained a good deal, so that Eugenie has been "meeting people" all her life. Though an aristocrat by birth, she is rather democratic in feeling. Her mother did not object when her daughter desired to enter of the Lowell High school, though she herself was educated at private institutions of learning. Miss Hawes should have an easy triumph when she enters the whirl of society, for she has any number of relatives to entertain her and give her a good time. Her aunt, Mrs. Jimmy Robinson, is planning all sorts of good things for her niece's social menu when Eugenie shall have been fairly launched.

The Church Seal

Now that Easter is tripping on our heels, some of those who threw dust in Lent's eyes are beginning to apologize to their rectors, and the forbidden gayeties are being shown their proper place on the calendar. The affairs are tapering down to the pink teas for pale people sort. There is no blinking at the fact that somehow San Francisco society does not pay even that allegiance to the Church that is demanded in the East. It is a rather important matter to belong to a church with a fashionable seal once you cross the Rockies, but on this rim of the continent occupying a front pew in a fashionable church does not even admit one into the vestibule of society. When Mrs. Clover was out here, friends congratulated her on penetrating into the fashionable holy of holies. Just before Mrs. Clover left Washington she gave a fancy dress ball for children and the list of young guests was a keynote to the Clover social position in Washington. From the Roosevelt children to the juveniles of the foreign legations the cream of Washington childhood was there. "My husband's father and grandfather," laughingly explained Mrs. Clover, "had the good taste to choose the right church. It's not enough to be a pewholder yourself; but if your ancestors passed the plate then you may lay some claim to being an 'old' member."

The entertaining of the children of society may also be counted distinctive of the East for certainly San Francisco parents have never notably indulged their offsprings in this line. Affairs like the Clover ball and the recent dinner party given by the children of a Cabinet officer have had no parallel out here. Perhaps it is just as well that the juveniles in our smart set are not allowed a peep over the garden wall until they are out of the schoolroom. But the bars have evidently been let down in the East.

Mrs. Meynell in Chicago

Mrs. Franklin MacVeagh of Chicago is doing for that city what Agnes Tobin tried to accomplish for the San Francisco smart set. Mrs. Alice Meynell is visiting Mrs. MacVeagh and the mental aristocrats of the windy city are according Mrs. Meynell the homage that somehow did not drift her way out here. The only explanation of this indifference is that our aristocracy of brains and wealth are at opposite poles. Certainly Mrs. Meynell did not impress the smart set—the people who are on the Tobins' visiting list. Those who split their gloves over the noted English essayist were blue-stockings, who paid the price of admission to her lectures. Thomas Hardy has declared Mrs. Meynell the best woman conversationalist in all England, but people out here did not give themselves a chance to test his opinion. The truth of the matter is they were afraid to get into deep waters with her. They steered clear of anything but an exchange of commonplaces. The men especially drew the chalk line and if there was a society man who dared a tete-a-tete with Mrs. Meynell, history does not relate it. When a woman carries so much excess baggage in her caput it's bound to make ordinary mortals put a brake on their tongues. There are plenty of heavy weight talkers in San Francisco but conversationalists are rare as the eggs of the great Auk. "We had some talk," Dr. Johnson once remarked after a dinner, "but there was no conversation." Mrs. Meynell might put ditto marks under that for San Francisco.

Her Weak Point

However, the women clutched at one consolation—for though Mrs. Meynell wore a halo she didn't wear her clothes well. And as for her style of her hair dressing, even those accustomed to the London fringe—and fog—found it impossible. It was decided that the late Coventry Patmore might have been correct when he declared Mrs. Meynell the greatest woman poet since Sappho, but that she knew nothing of the poetry of dress. Now that Mrs. Meynell has gone the smart set can return to its flesh pots and forget that she made them feel like the Peri at the gate to higher thought.

Will the Baron Get a New Trial

San Rafael is in a twitter at the mere possibility that the Baron von Schroeder's nauseous libel suit against John D. Spreckels will be tried again. The Baron seems to think that he is entitled to a second inning, and his counsel, Judge Maguire, consumed many hours last week in outlining to Judge Angelotti his client's sixteen reasons for demanding a new trial. On one point, especially, the "Little Giant" hammered away with a thewy vehemence that, so I am told, he has not displayed since he forsook the anvil for the toga. The alleged libel, according to Judge Maguire, consisted in the statement that because of the conduct of the Baron and his friends the hotel had ceased to pay, and that therefore General Warfield had obtained the cancellation of his lease. Now, Maguire argued, Mr. Spreckels presented no evidence at all of the truth of these particular allegations, although, to be sure, he produced numerous witnesses who testified as to certain other matters. There had been, he claimed, a complete failure of evidence constituting justification, and in the absence of such evidence the jury should not have considered the testimony concerning other matters, as it was admissible only in mitigation of damages. Maguire's ingenious plea, delivered with all the clang and blaze of a volcanic upheaval, startled Judge Angelotti and sent the usually placid Mr. Preston on a mad scramble among his law books; but it did not ruffle the hyperborean calm of Mr. Delmas. As soon as the eruption was over, Delmas swished a few buckets of ice-water over Maguire's lava and red-hot ashes and the Court took the matter under advisement.

"I hate that fellow."
"What did he ever do to you?"
"Tried to collect some money I owed him."

Our Indian Costume

Mrs. D. D. Colton is among the San Franciscans who are cutting quite a figure in Washington society this winter, and she easily fits into the social life of the capital. Mrs. Colton was always a great traveler. She took frequent trips abroad when she lived in California, and used to tell many amusing anecdotes of travel. One of them illustrates the hazy idea untraveled English people have about us. While touring in Scotland General and Mrs. Colton fell into conversation with a couple who were in the same compartment of their railway carriage, and the lady asked Mrs. Colton what countrywoman she was. When told, she returned, "An American!" with an air of astonishment; "and do you always dress as you do now?" Mrs. Colton told her that she usually dressed much better, as she happened then to have on her traveling costume, and inquired why she asked. "Oh," said her fellow-traveler, "I thought all Americans wore blankets."

Another Redwood Writer

The atmospheric conditions of Redwood City must certainly be provocative of literary effort. Every Californian who is a reader of Gertrude Atherton's fervid writings knows that it was while dwelling in that locale that the dreams began which later took shape in her novels; and now another aspirant for literary honors in bobbing up from there in the person of Mr. Charles Josselyn, who has written quite an ambitious work. Singularly enough the lady who is now Mrs. Josselyn, as Miss Mary Greenwood was the fiancee of George Atherton, who, after the breaking of the engagement, married Gertie Uhlhorn.

Why He took in his Shingle

According to the dailies Dr. Harry Tevis is in constant attendance upon his mother, who has been in an alarming condition. But Dr. Tevis is not acting in a professional capacity. Years ago, when he became a physician, he opened an office in New York. One of his first patients sued him for damages and obtained judgment. The doctor's father, Lloyd Tevis, paid the bill, but made his son promise that he would never try his skill on a human being again. And the doctor took in his shingle.

Kipling in French

Kipling's poem on England's army athletes attracted a deal of attention in France. The poem has been translated into French and published in some of the Paris newspapers. Le Temps renders the familiar lines "with the flanneled fools at the wicket or the muddied oafs at the goals" as follows:

"—— les imbeciles en complete de flanelle qui jouent au cricket, Et les cretins souilles de boue qui jouent au football."

Because he is not a Whole Man

There is a story going the rounds that Dr. Kierstedt, the fiance of Miss McBean, will be obliged to resign from the army on account of a lack of bony substance. His attack of the measles was a bad one, and to save his life it was necessary to amputate a rib to prevent complications. And now it is said that the loss of the rib may necessitate the loss of his army job.

Genges, but Not Julius

Dr. Gardner, interpreter for the local United States Chinese Bureau, is engaged in the work of translating a lot of tablets, which found their way from far Cathay in the loot brought him by our soldiers and officers. The other day he had a writing under examination which referred to Genges Khan, one of the great Manchurian warriors at the beginning of the present dynasty, and Commissioner Heacock happened into the office just as the doctor finished telling a newspaper man of the famous Chinese soldier. "That fellow, Genges Khan, was a fighter, all right, wasn't he?" said the newspaper man.

"Julius Kahn, Julius Kahn," said Heacock, testily, looking at the scribe. "A fighter, did you say? Who did Julius Kahn ever fight?"

"I see that Mrs. Martin says that her sons are college bred, but that a man can be a gentleman without a college education."

"I agree with her but I wonder if her conclusion is based on false premises. She may argue that as all college graduates are not gentlemen therefore a man may be a gentleman without the help of a college education."

Would Like to be a Sea Dog

Every one has his hobby or fad—some little conceit in his cosmos that he nurses and cherishes adown the years, thinking all the time how much better off or happier he would have been had he followed the bent of his weakness. As a rule these longings in men run in most surprising forms and directly opposite to the individual's position and avocation. Now who would think that George Knight, with all his success as an attorney and the hope of political preferment that he has, would rather be a sea captain than anything else? In appearance, and especially when he garbs himself in the long navy ulster that he occasionally wears, he is the typical master of the big ocean greyhound class. His enthusiasm is boyish when he discusses the subject, and the suggestion of his being on the bridge of some great brute of a liner, that he knew was responsive to his every touch, the nod of his head, the wave of a hand, takes him off his feet completely. It happened that while visiting New York recently he accompanied a party of prominent politicians, men high in the councils of the Republican party, to the Cunard company's wharf on a sailing day. The Lucania was pulling out, and after watching her with critical eye and throbbing pulse for several minutes, as she majestically drew away from the pier, Knight exclaimed:

"Say, I'd rather be captain of that ship than President of the United States."

"Oh, you're crazy," said one of his companions.

"Don't you think I'm crazy," answered the Californian hotly; "not a bit of it. I meant just what I said," and he lapsed into silence and admiration of the outward bound steamship.

The Star of the Show

Society did not turn out in force at the opening of the spring exhibition of the Art Association, but Miss Doris Jeffrey was there. She wore her favorite black spangled, eel-fitting frock and a big black picture hat beneath whose spreading brim and long plumes her tiny face was nearly lost sight of. She was as much a part of the exhibition as the pictures, as she strolled about, sometimes in company with a young artist, and sometimes with her woman companion, a big brunette also gowned in black and spangles. Miss Jeffrey's resemblance to Margaret Anglin is marked and in the much talked of portrait by Sandona the likeness to the actress is even more striking. She is only beautiful when she smiles, for her features are not regular and it is only when her dimples assert themselves that her charm impresses. Dr. Genthe knew that when he took those photographs of her which were shown at the Photographic Salon. And Sandona knew it when he painted her portrait. It shows Miss Jeffrey in a pink gown, her face all smiles and dimples. Sandona is the most prominent figure in local art circles today, and this prominence was thrust upon him by the absurd jealousy of his brother artists. Their malice has given him more advertisement than his talent, undoubted though it is, would have gained for him in a decade. Everybody is talking about the young man and the five portraits shown at the Hopkins. The best of them, taking likeness, treatment and pose into consideration, is that of Mrs. Fremont Older. He has caught the subject's habitual thoughtful expression and the pose is original and graceful, the white gown and pearls being admirably shaded.

The Green-Eyed Monster

The spring exhibition is far from being as good as that of the Bohemian club artists a few months ago. This, again, is largely owing to the jealous feeling among the artists, a feeling that has been steadily growing of late and which has manifested itself in many ways. Year after year the Art Association has had to contend with this spirit of jealousy and it perhaps explains why the exhibitions are not so successful as they should be. It was that feeling that caused Mathews on one occasion to withdraw a picture that had been accepted, because the hanging did not suit him. Joullin, Dickman, Mathews—where are their pictures? They are not represented, and they with others of their clique say they are going to have a little exhibition of their own. Even Wores sent nothing, but then he is far away and may have had nothing new to send.

A Preponderance of Feminine Work

There is too much of woman's work on view. Not that woman's work is not meritorious in its way, but it lacks as a rule that forceful, broad touch that is given by the Maker of all to the masculine hand. Some of the women, though, have done well. Anne Bremer has a beautiful study of a head. Olga Ackerman's portraits are good exemplars of her peculiar style. Miss Whitefield has two charming sketches, "Sunset" and "Reflections." Mrs. T. H. Thompson's sketch, "Bay Farm Island," Annie Harmon's "Marsh, Larkspur," Helen Courvoisier's "Wind Swept Trees," Louise Carpenter's "Path in the Sand Dunes," Augusta Graves' "San Leandro Bay," Annie Frances Briggs' "Monterey Sands"—these are all worthy of mention. Evelyn McCormick's two large paintings—"Water Front View of the old Custom House, Monterey," and "An Old Adobe"—are exceptionally strong treatments of subjects with which everybody is familiar. Alice Chittenden's portrait has improved so that she now ranks with the best of our portrait painters. Her portrait of William C. Taylor is one of the best things in the exhibition. Maren Froelich has ventured far from her ballet girl field and shows a "Mt. Shasta" which is not however to be compared with her figure work. Matilda Lotz sent two animal studies which easily explain the reason she has obtained eminence abroad and has been compared to Rosa Bonheur. Emilia Kalisher, who does such good work, shows nothing this year.

What the Men have Hung

The redwoods were favored by Gamble, Latimer, and Robinson and their different treatments of the giant trees are interesting. Keith has two paintings in his later style, "In the Forest" and "Mono Pass and Lake." Bloomer, who is never troubled by petty jealousies and always tries to make a better showing at each succeeding exhibition, has seven paintings. "Mill Valley from the Ridge" shows him at his best, and Bloomer's best is something to attract connoisseurs. A "Contemplation" by Baumgartner and a decorative frieze by Piazzoni—who shares the Sandona boycott among the artists—are oddly interesting. Cadenasso's "A Pool" is full of the atmospheric effects in which he delights. Stanton's studies are lifelike, particularly a woman's head and one of an old Breton. Aaron Altmann's "After Sundown" is one of five worthy sketches. Kunath's "Portrait of an Old Gentleman" is a fine treatment of a face full of intelligence and charm. Raschen's portrait studies should receive more than a passing glance, especially two Patriziers. Orrin Peck has nothing new, only the portraits that were seen at the Bohemian club hanging. A. W. Best has a good "Mt. Tamalpais." Martinez has lent a bit of humor to his showing in "The Dream." Perhaps he did not mean it as a joke, but it has that effect. A very shadowy lady has evidently accomplished the feat of walking on the water to coquet with a man in a boat. He seems to have a bad headache, judging by his attitude, and the general impression gained by the Reve is that it is the outcome of a spiritual seance.

The Miniatures

There are three cases of miniatures, showing that this branch of art is gaining in favor. Lillie V. O'Ryan's three miniatures are beautiful. She catches the flitting expression of her subject perfectly. Her portrait of Marie Oge brings out the spirituelle look in Miss Oge's face, just as did Theodore Wores in his portrait of her. Kunath has one miniature of a little girl that is charming, and also one of a golden-haired girl in a Juliet cap. Miniature painting is only just beginning to be looked upon as more than a fad. There is still, of course, among those who regard works of art by size, an unfortunate tendency to look upon miniatures simply as curiosities; pretty trifles, but thoroughly unworthy of serious consideration. London has a Society of Miniaturists and a Society of Miniature Painters. These were formed for the purpose of raising the art to the high standard established in England a number of years ago. And though not many Cosways and Plimers are found in London today, still the existence of two such societies proves that the interest taken in England, in miniature painting, is a healthy one. There are still sufficient miniature painters in London to make two formidable bands to fight the "artistic photographers" who threaten the degeneration of the finer art.

Little Things but Valuable

San Francisco has been slow to take to the miniature. When Magda Heuermann, the idol of New York and Chicago art lovers, brought herself and her miniatures to San Francisco, she was almost rendered mute by the apathy she encountered. A few people attended her exhibition, she received a scant number of orders, was asked to teach a limited class of pupils, and that was all. The photograph was preferred to her miniatures by the majority. Then came the exhibition of portraits of beautiful women at the Hopkins. There were miniatures among the portraits shown and these were so much admired that interest in the delicate art of miniature painting received a temporary impetus. People who had hitherto scorned the tiny portraits began to appreciate their exquisite details. They began to read up about miniatures. And there is much entertainment to be gained from a perusal of the annals of miniatures and their makers.

There are still many admirable samples of Greek miniatures in existence, to be seen in the galleries of Europe. The figure drawing in these is delicate, but exaggerated in length; the colors are abnormally bright and the brilliant effect is heightened by a gold background. Many Italian miniatures of the fourteenth century are also extant, and they are interesting studies to the modern painter. The figures in these differ from the Greek miniatures, in that they are shortened. The draperies are always in straight folds. Examples of early Spanish miniatures preserved in the museums show them stiff and rough in drawing, and in sombre colors, black being a favorite background. It is the examples of French, English and Flemish miniatures that show how the art really thrived and improved until it is what we know now. The miniatures of Miss O'Ryan show the latest and best of modern knowledge.

A most effective presentment of Pope Leo XIII's features is that in John T. Woolrich's bas relief of His Holiness, which is one of the topics of the day in art circles. The young sculptor has achieved a remarkable result in molding the Pope's lineaments, particularly in the expression. His work is noticeable for its strength and sincerity.

COLORADO CLAY—ITS REMARKABLE EFFECT UPON THE HAIR.

Turns white hair black, brown, auburn, or Titian red. Restores gray hair to its original color without changing the natural colors. Peroxide ends made to equal the new hair growing out. Bleached hair will take a rich golden or chestnut. The color is regulated by the number of hours in the clay bath. The strongest shampoo will not affect it, nor does the clay stain the scalp in any particular.

With the Money Makers

Fakes and Frauds

If you are offered an investment guaranteed to pay you more than current rates of interest, look at it carefully, for more than likely you will not profit by putting money in it. It is exhilarating to get fifteen, twenty or thirty per cent. interest a year for every dollar you invest in, but it is not safe. There is certainly "a nigger in the wood pile." San Francisco is crowded with fakes and frauds. You may have promised you almost any interest you fancy. "Syndicate" Miller, who paid ten per cent. a month, and who got millions from his dupes, has some daring disciples. Miller is in the penitentiary. These ardent promisers are in all lines—oil, gold, silver and copper mining, stocks, etc. I could not get on this page a list of those operating in California for lack of space, but here is a fair sample: Company—Sunset Mining Company. Location—Chronicle Building. Chief Grafter—G. W. Rumble. Promises—Two per cent. a month.

Rumble is the whole thing in the Sunset Mining Company here. In the East Mrs. K. E. Allington of Rochester, N. Y., is the head. Rumble is nearing three score and ten. His beard is white, his head baldish, and his hand trembling. His office is plainly furnished. He is alone in it except for an active stenographer. His desk is littered with nuggets and vials of gold dust. He has photographs of other nuggets on the walls. He guarantees to pay two per cent. dividends a month on every share of stock you buy. The Sunset Mining Company has a few million shares to sell at $1 a share to investors. If you invest a thousand dollars Rumble will positively agree to give you back two hundred and forty dollars a year in dividends. He says perhaps he might pay five per cent. a month. His advertisements read: "Our drift-gravel mine, 'Old Glory,' has developed into a record breaker. Old Californian miners are both surprised and chagrined at the results. Come and see 'Old Glory' turn out gold nuggets daily. It is simply glorious."

His Evidence of Prosperity

I went to see Rumble. He was suspicious, and refused to answer more than a few general questions. He showed me checks being sent out for the two per cent. dividends to scores of investors. Rumble has paid the two per cent. a month right along. He invited me to heft nuggets, and to look at the photographs. When I pressed him further he exclaimed: "You are a doubting Thomas. I'll show you what kind of a man I am." He seized me by the arm and hurried me across the street to the Columbian Banking Company in the Claus Spreckels building. Up to the cashier's window he dashed with me, and asked: "How much is my balance here today?" The cashier beamed. He consulted his ledger, and replied in the tone of a man dealing with a good customer: "You have this morning $10,785.92." Rumble hurried out of the building, still holding my arm, and exclaimed triumphantly: "That looks like business, don't it? I guess 'Old Glory's' all right." Then down Market street we hastened to the safe deposit vaults in the Crocker building. Rumble walked through the massive steel gates, asked the guardian of the vaults to assist him, and opened a great treasure chest. From this he took a number of milk bottles and two or three cash boxes. In the seclusion of a small room he showed me these filled with what looked like gold. He certainly had the money, and he certainly is paying two per cent. a month. But the money is not coming out of "Old Glory," or any other mine owner by Rumble or the Sunset Mining Company. It is the money of Rumble's victims that is returned to them at the rate of one-fifth of their investment returned to them at the rate of one-fiftieth of their investment each month. What Rumble's ultimate scheme is I don't know, but I fancy he thinks he cannot live more than half a dozen years or so, and trusts to escape the law for that long. He is now in trouble through one of his dupes refusing to be swindled longer.

ments in other stocks and bonds were generally confined to small ways and values ruled easy. About the middle of the week Alaska Packers' stock began settling and prices depreciated steadily, brokers giving no positive reason for the decline, but the suggestion is that the indications for easier fish prices and possible labor troubles at the canneries, is the cause. The report that several hundred shares of Oceanic Steamship Company were sold short at about $36 materially stimulated the demand for the stock and prices bounded up from $37 to $41, with offerings exceedingly scarce. The shorts evidently made good in fast time and rates receded almost as rapidly as they advanced. Spring Valley held up quite well, touching as high as $52.50, and many shares changed hands. The adoption of the new water rates by the Supervisors which gives the company a much better income from the city than it obtained last year made the stock quite desirable. Offerings were liberal but had no depressing effect on prices. Bank of California shares were strong and several small parcels changed control at $423. Sugar stocks had no special attraction for speculators. Market-street offerings were scarce and sold well at par, there being more buyers than sellers.

With the sale of the properties and pertinences of the Market Street Railway Company to the Baltimore Syndicate there will be a reorganization and change of name of the corporation. From the prospectus recently issued it is learned that the new title will be the United Railways of San Francisco. It is also proposed to retire the present bond issues by the issuance of new bonds and new stock will be issued in lieu of the old. In a speculative way there have been a few sales of the new securitis on the street, delivery to be made at the prices agreed upon as soon as the new securities are regularly listed on the Board. The following reported sales give an idea as to what the new securities will open at when placed on call: Bonds, $89, preferred stock, $61, bid; $62, asked; common, $22.50, bid; $23 asked.

Operations in the Oil Exchange have been quite limited, operators generally being backward and little interest was manifested in the daily sessions of the board. But few stocks have been represented in the transactions and sales in most instances have been small. Reports from the oil fields have been satisfactory and considerable new development work is in progress. Sales on the Exchange last week were 36,134 shares, valued at $21,282, the leading sales being as follows: Four, 3,100 shares; Home, 2,505; Independence, 1,000; Petroleum Center, 11,650; Reed, 2,925; Occidental, 2,300; Lion, 2,600; Sterling, 2,650; Monarch, 1,900; Sovereign, 3,800.

There were no special features in the Pine street mining market last week, sales generally being light and fluctuations confined within narrow limits. Consolidated Virginia and California was held steady at $1.30 and Ophir showed some evidence of strength also. During the last few days Ophir, Mexican, Best and Belcher and Silver Hill seemed to possess the leading elements of firmness. The Consolidated California and Virginia Milling Company announces the sale of a large quantity of ore concentrates for which $14,735.64 was received.

The statement of the Anglo-Californian Bank, which was presented on Monday at the head offices in London, has been issued for the information of shareholders generally. It shows a profit of over 40,000 pounds, for the year 1901, which, with the balance brought forward from 1900, leaves over 50,000 pounds to be distributed. This has paid 6 per cent and has added 25,000 pounds to the reserve fund.

Reports from British Columbia advise that Henry Doyle, formerly a resident of San Francisco, backed by Eastern capitalists to the extent of $3,500,000, has successfully engineered a deal in which fifty out of the seventy salmon canneries on the Frazier and Salmon rivers have entered into a combination and the syndicate practically controls the output in the northern part of the province. The plan of the combination is that a price averaging from $35,000 to $50,000, according to the capacity, be paid to each cannery and also a certain percentage of the stock of the new company. The intention is to operate only about half of the canneries as the output is considered far in excess of requirements.

Salvation Mining Stocks

Some years ago when real estate men sought to popularize the sale of lots in city additions, they gave excursions and had music and dancing to encourage the bidders. The latest is the selling of oil stock to the music of tambourines. The Salvation Army is the medium for the foisting of a more than rotten deal upon the public. William J. Brewer was editor of the War Cry in New York, until recently, when he was fired by Booth-Tucker. It was found that Brewer had been selling more oil stocks than War Cries, and had not been as hot in the chase for souls as for buyers. He had been instilling into his associates the heretical doctrine that this world's goods were worth something. As soon as Brewer was kicked out he formed the "Albert E. Hall Company," using the name of a printer on the War Cry. Now, the "Albert E. Hall Company" is advertising extensively. The companies it promotes are "The International Zinc Company," "The Great Republican Gold Mining Company," and "The Consolidated Oil Lands." Much oil stock was sold to the lassies, who make night hideous with their discord, and who frequent the saloons to sell the lurid War Cry. Meanwhile, former editor Brewer and his gang are fattening on the investing public.

UNDER THE TABLE.

Under the table lieth, I ween,
Country mysterious, land all unseen;
Over the feast, with its glitter and show,
Falls the soft light with a radiant glow;
Here sits a woman, like haughtiest queen,
Frowning at look or suggestion unclean;
Pure she appears as the diamond's sheen—
That is, above-board; but ah, is it so,
Under the table?

A lesson of life we easily glean
O'er the white levels, which here intervene
'Twixt what is above and what is below:
My lady demure is as cold as the snow
Up here in the light, but what does she mean
Under the table?

SCHOOL OF CONCENTRATION

This school has been in successful operation for the past eight years at 406 Sutter street and numbers among its students some of the best minds of the State. Our method of instruction is by demonstration. We teach you how to strengthen your memory, become self-reliant, to overcome habits and appetites, to control your children and your environments and those with whom you come in contact. We develop your will power and teach you how to use it. Concentration has nothing in common with Hypnotism, Religion, New Thought or other fads. Instruction private, not classes. We solicit investigation.

Diary of an Impecunious Gentleman

Monday: I am very grateful to Mrs. Astor. My status is at last assured. I had always doubted if a man without a bank account could call himself a gentleman. But my mind is at rest. I am college bred, a graduate of Harvard, therefore I am a gentleman. I may hang up my last decent pair of trousers, and go about in my golf suit. I may appear at luncheon in a sweater. I may refuse to tip a waiter. I may forget to give up my place in the car when Mrs. Pacific Avenue is standing. For I am a gentleman. The fact that my diploma of graduation from Harvard reposes in my father's office warms my heart. But I wish I could borrow a V on the strength of my social status.

Tuesday: I dined today at Mrs. Smartem's. We had a spirited discussion over the coffee about the Astor idea. Mrs. Smartem takes the stand that a man need not be a college graduate to make money; i. e., to be a gentleman. Her idea is that any moneyed man who doesn't mix his negatives and who can carry off his evening clothes with a certain air is a gentleman. Well, I'd be willing to agree with her for an X. My credit is getting low. If it weren't for that dinner today, I'd have gone hungry. I think I'll have to cut in and get an heiress after all, though it's against my principles to marry for money. Mais, que-voulez-vous?

Wednesday: Somebody said that monotony is the pool into which a fool sinks, and above which a genius soars. There's only one way to soar above such monotony as that in which I'm sinking. I really must do something. Lunched with Miss Nob Hill today. She called it luncheon, but it answered for breakfast and dinner for me as well. It was a nice solid meal. She asked me to come again soon, so that we might enjoy another heart-to-heart talk. I wonder what she means by soon—tomorrow?

Thursday: I pawned my raglan today. A foolish act, too, for there is that opera party tomorrow night and what I am going to do I don't know. I must be sure and go, for they will have supper in the blue room afterwards and my stomach can't afford to miss it. It is Miss Nob Hill's party.

Friday: I borrowed Dick Easy's raglan. He is always obliging. I owe him a few dollars, too. Really, I must do something in that heiress business. Would Miss Nob Hill do? Oh, but she's got such a squint, and besides her father was a pawnbroker. What would my father say to such a match?

Saturday: Am almost famished. They didn't have supper in the blue room, after all. Miss Nob Hill thought it would be more fun to have it in a funny little oyster grotto in the Latin Quarter. So we drove there and had a Dutch lunch—crackers, cheese, beer and raw oysters as a finish. They carried on like children and seemed to be enjoying themselves more than if the spread had been champagne and terrapin. But I was disappointed enough to cry. Fortunately, I was able to sneak a few crackers, which did me for breakfast. Am expecting a letter from father today. Perhaps he'll send me a cheque. I ought to pay Dick Easy and some of those fellows.

Saturday: Mrs. Swellbury says I must pay my room bill or step out. She says she has duties to her daughters to think of, their gowns and hats and things, and she isn't running a charity orphan asylum. She says if I were a gentleman, I would not make a poor lone widow wait for her money. I had my answer ready. I told her I must be a gentleman, for Mrs. Astor said so; that I am a Harvard graduate. But she said graduate or no graduate, her daughters needed money for the summer campaign, and if I couldn't pay there was a young parvenu with money to burn who would take my room at once. I asked her to give me grace until Monday. She shouldn't have come down so hard on me this morning. My heart feels weak. So does my stomach. Where shall I lunch? Where shall I dine? * * * Oh, I have looked at my engagement book and find that I am invited to three teas this afternoon and an Orpheum party this evening. How lucky that I still have Easy's raglan here.

Sunday: Yesterday was a fast day of the church, but a feast day for me. I haven't had such a lot of good luck for an age. At Miss Jones' tea she had salad and sandwiches and nice little cocktails in teacups. At Mrs. Brown's there was tea, with German cakes. At Miss Smith-Green's I got there so late that they begged me to join them at dinner, and then sent me home in their own carriage, so I had lots of time to dress for the Orpheum party. After the show we all went to the Drinkand and had a magnificent spread at Young Million's expense. I heard some one say, "He's an awful mean fellow. Goes everywhere and never spends a cent. Not a gentleman, I say." I wonder whom they referred to! I am so glad no one need ever question my being a gentleman. Never before have I been so grateful to my father for sending me to college. He gave me the cachet that time. At church today—I always go to church, for there is then a chance of being in for a lunch or a dinner somewhere—I caught Miss Readimoney rubbering at me all through the Commandments and Litany. She is a nice little thing and dotes on college men. Her father was a janitor at the University, which explains her fancy, I suppose. He got a lucky tip in stocks and that gave him the chance of his life. His only daughter wears a halo of ciphers. But she has a snub nose and a Limerick mouth.

Monday: Mrs. Swellsbury sent me formal notice to quit today. What shall I do? Shall I defy her? No cheque from my father. Poor man! I guess he finds it hard to run his family, for the girls are all unmarried and expensive. Mother writes that she looks for me, with my college education, to do something great. I'm supposed to be engaged in Judge Noted's law office, and so I am, but as there are ten other clerks my chances for making a few cents at typewriting briefs is scanty, especially since the others are all related to him and have a pull. Guess I'll have to swallow my pride and ask Ned Cotillon's advice. He knows everything, and has engineered lots of undowried youths into millioned fields.

Tuesday: I didn't have to ask Ned, apres tout. Mrs. Swellsbury's the peach. She came in and had a soul-to-soul chat with me last night. She said she knew my mother in the long ago; that they were schoolmates at Madame Thingumbob's seminary, and that she couldn't bear to be cruel to me. But she must be paid, of course, and she showed me the way. It seems she knows a girl who wants to enter the swim and is willing to pave the way to the magic portal with chunks of gold. But Mrs. Swellsbury has struck so many snags in introducing uncultured money into the swim that she feels fearsome about trying it again. Therefore, she proposes that I marry the girl, give her my social position as a crutch, and assist her to her ambition. The result will be that Mrs. S. will get her room rent and a fat fee from the girl, the girl will get her wish and I will get my worries off. "If you weren't a gentleman," Mrs. S. said, "I wouldn't tell you of this snap. But I always trust a gentleman." She didn't say anything about the short trust she gave me for my room. I agreed to think it over.

Wednesday: Buncoed! I signed an agreement with Mrs. S., and then she brought out the girl. Wouldn't tell me before who it was. Said it wasn't businesslike. And it was Miss Readimoney, whom I might have had without any of Mrs. Swellsbury's palaver. I agreed to pay the old lady a plump commission, too. Well, I must abide by my contract. I am, as I have known since my birth, a gentleman of my word. But it does wound my pride to think of letting a woman get the better of me like that.

Tacking Ship off Shore

(The following verses are published by request. They were written by a Miss Nichols at the age of fifteen. She sailed the seas on the American ship, S. P. Hitchcock. The verses have rarely been published. They are remarkable for the aptness of nautical terms used, and the familiarity displayed by the author with the language of the sailor.)

The weather leech of the topsail shivers,
The bowlines strain and the lee shrouds slacken
The braces are taught and the lithe boom quivers,
As the waves with the coming squall-cloud blacken.

Open one point on the weather bow.
Is the light-house tall on the Island Head;
There's a shade of doubt on the Captain's brow,
And the pilot watches the heaving lead.

I stand at the wheel, and with eager eye
To sea and sky and to shore I gaze,
Till the muttered order of "Full and by"
Is suddenly changed to "Full for stays."

The ship bends lower before the breeze,
As her broadside fair to the blast she lays,
And she swifter springs to the rising seas
As the pilot calls "Stand by for stays!"

It is silence all, as each in his place,
With the gathered coil in his hardened hands,
By tack and bowline, by sheet and brace,
Waiting the watchword, impatient stands.

And the light on the Island Head draws near,
As trumpet-winged the pilot's shout
From his post on the bowsprit's heel I hear,
With the welcome call of "Ready, about!"

No time to spare; 'tis touch and go,
And the Captain growls, "Down helm! hard down!"
As my weight on the whirling spokes I throw,
While heaven grows black with the storm-cloud's frown.

High o'er the knight-heads flies the spray,
As we meet the shock of the plunging sea,
And my shoulder stiff to the wheel I lay,
As I answer, "Aye, aye, sir, hard a lee!"

With the swerving leap of a startled steed,
The ship flies fast in the eyes of the wind,
The dangerous shoals on the lee recede,
And the headland white we have left behind.

The topsails flutter, the jibs collapse,
And belly and tug at the groaning cleats;
The spanker slaps, and the mainsail flaps,
And thunders the order, "Tacks and sheets!"

'Mid the rattle of blocks and the tramp of the crew,
Hisses the rain of the rushing squall;
The sails are aback from clew to clew,
And now is the moment for "Mainsail haul!"

And the heavy yards, like a baby's toy,
By fifty strong arms are swiftly swung;
She holds her way, and I look with joy,
For the first white spray o'er the bulwarks flung.

"Let go and haul!" 'tis the last command,
And the head-sails fill to the blast once more,
Astern and to leeward lies the land,
With its breakers white on the shingly shore.

What matters the reef or the rain or the squall,
I steady the helm for the open sea;
The first mate clamors, "Belay there all,"
And the Captain's breath once more comes free.

And so off shore let the good ship fly,
Little care I how the gusts may blow;
In my fo'castle bunk in a jacket dry,
Eight bells have struck and my watch is below.

Heinrich's Enoch Arden and Song Recitals

Max Heinrich and his daughter Julia will appear here after an absence of four years at Sherman-Clay hall, Tuesday and Thursday nights, April first and third and Saturday afternoon, April fifth. On Tuesday night the program will be a novel one. The first part will be devoted to Richard Strauss' musical setting of "Enoch Arden," Mr. Heinrich at the piano. The second part will be: Songs—In Picardie, Arthur Foote, The Lark now Leaves his Watery Nest, Horatio Parker, Send me a Lover, St. Valentine (sixteenth century), Old English, Miss Heinrich; Songs—Des Knaben's Wunderhorn, Die beiden Grenadiere, Schumann, Mr. Heinrich. The program for Thursday night will contain a group of four numbers by Emil Bruguiere, which have met with great success in the East. Other numbers will be: Duetts—So war die Sonne Scheint, Unterm Fenster, Schumann; Songs—Fruelingsglaube, Standchen, Die Taubenpost, Schubert, Mr. Heinrich; Songs—L'Esclave, Marine, Lalo, Arioso, Myrtho, Delibes, Miss Heinrich; Duetts—Gondoleria, Henschel, Amour Villageoise, Mein Herz Werde Wach, Goring Thomas; Songs—Spring Song Mackenzie, It is not Always May, Gounod, Songs my Mother Taught Me, Dvorak, Der Erl Koenig, Schubert, Mr. Heinrich. The sale of seats will begin next Saturday at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s and the prices will be seventy-five cents, one dollar and one dollar and a half. The Heinrichs' will appear at the Unitarian church, Oakland, Friday, April fourth.

The Davises

The most popular manager in Chicago, or anywhere else, is Will J. Davis of the Illinois, the newest and most jeune siecle playhouse in the windy city. Mr. Davis is also one of the theatre's proprietors, in connection with Al Hayman. Will Davis is Jessie Bartlett Davis' husband, and they are a most congenial couple. They are much entertained socially. A recent event, at which they were the guests of honor, was a dinner given by Sir Henry Irving in the green room of the Auditorium. The popularity of the fascinating Jessie has never dimmed and her name on a program is always a certainty of success. She still sings "Oh, Promise Me," because the public insists upon it. She has lately been singing at the Columbus, a return engagement, her numbers being "The Rosary," with "Love's Sacred Trust" and "Sunshine," two songs by Carrie Jacobs Bond of Chicago. Mrs. Davis looks forward to her next visit to San Francisco. She has many friends here.

Blanche Walsh and her Play

It is not easy of comprehension why Blanche Walsh chose such a ragbag of a drama as "La Madeleine" for her present starring tour. "More than Queen" was only a series of striking pictures, but "La Madeleine" is less than that. As a burlesque on the plays from which Harry Dam has borrowed in constructing his drama it might have a certain vogue, say, like that of "The Hall of Fame." But there is no vitality even in its principal figure, the Manon-Mimi-Camille-Zaza-Sapho who is called La Madeleine. Certain climaxes give scope for Blanche Walsh's emotionalism, but there is no definite reason why these climaxes should be. The dailies having ventilated all the intricacies of the plot, there is no reason for me to consume valuable space by retailing it. The characters, with the exception of the Prince and the Priest, are not well drawn, and the latter in most of his situations is absurd. When Blanche Walsh again comes this way, I hope she will have a better play than either "More than Queen," or "La Madeleine." At one time she gave promise of becoming one of the best of our emotional actresses, but the promise has not matured. The best work she ever did was as the heroine of "Trilby" and of "La Tosca."

Good for a Vaudeville Sketch

There is one scene in Mr. Dam's play that could be lifted bodily from the work and, with some elaboration, made into an effective sketch for a duo of vaudeville artists. That is the incident in the garden, in the first act, where two men bet on which lump of sugar a fly will first alight. It is acted well, too, and gives relief to what would otherwise be anything but an entertaining act. 'Tis a pity the playwright could not have imparted into his glimpse of lower Bohemia some of the ginger that La Madeleine desires the waiter to introduce into her absinthe.

There are three young women in Miss Walsh's company who will likely be heard of later on—Harriet Sterling, who enacts Albertine Charlot, Fanny Marinoff, the Rose Niel, and Rose Brahm, Toni Touchette. They are all remarkable for their beauty, and act their roles with understanding. Of the men, Mason Mitchell stands head and shoulders above the rest, just as the character he interprets is beyond any of the others Mr. Dam has created.

News of Norma

They are doing a great deal of talking in Chicago, a correspondent writes me, over the fact that Norma Whalley is to enter drama. Norma is said to be anxious to fit herself for dramatic work, and the Dearborn manager is to let her have a try at it. This is no new ambition on Norma's part, for she tried her hand at drama in this city in "A Contented Woman," but was persuaded by her critical friends that she'd better go back to her old field. In Chicago she is billed for a part in "The White Horse Tavern." The people in that city like Norma and she will probably receive kind treatment from them. She likes the city, too, even though it is the home of the widow who won Walter Jones away from her.

Nance O'Neill

The bust of Nance O'Neil at the Hopkins is a disappointment. It shows the actress as "Leah the Forsaken" but it has a more than lifesize effect that is repellant. There are so many more grateful roles in which Nance O'Neil has appeared that would have been better subjects, it seems curious the young sculptor should have singled out this one. Nance O'Neil has a beautiful face. Her features are not harsh, as this bust shows them. Her expression as Leah is tragic but that does not alter the shape of her classic features. Nance, by the way, must have opened at the Irving theatre in London by this time, and I am prepared to hear of a succession of her triumphs. If she keeps on as she has begun she will be California's greatest gift to the dramatic world. We have sent out any number of talented actresses, and fewer actors, but Nance O'Neil is a genius. It will probably be a long time before we see her here again. She is to own a theatre in London, built with her own money, the quarter of a million she and McKee Rankin made in Australia.

Juliet Crosby is always a welcome figure on the Alcazar stage and her return this week was warmly greeted on Monday night. She has the part of Lucille, the girl with the nervous affection, and puts any amount of intelligence into the role. Miss Crosby could do great things in her art if she had the strength, but she has not been in the best of health lately.

Rialto Gossip from the East

From New York a correspondent writes me that Eleanor Kent (Mabel Love) has made a big hit in "Foxy Quiller," having the prima role vacated by Helen Bertram. The papers praise her vocal work very highly. Laura Crews is now known as Laura Hope Crews and is still at the Murray Hill, where her ingenue work has won for her many good words from press and public. George De Long is with "A Messenger Boy" in a cast of one hundred, Jimmie Powers being the star. Ruth White is with Richard Carle's company in "The Explorers" at the Dearborn in Chicago.

'Tis an Ill Wind, Etc.

A story coming to me from Philadelphia is an instance of Dan Daly's quick wit. Daly was recently playing in "The New Yorkers" at one Quaker city theatre while Frank Daniels in "Miss Simplicity" was at another. The two comedians met one evening and in the course of their conversation a discussion arose about the engagement of a young woman who had agreed to sign with Daniels. The men had some hot words and Daniels finally said, "I may not be a model of virtue but no one ever accused me of being two-faced."

"And so you insinuate that I am?" asked Daly.

Daniels' silence gave assent to the insinuation and Daly hastily added:

"Great heavens, man! Do you think if I had two faces that I wouldn't always leave this one at home?"

Emery as a Playwright

Edwin Emery, of the Belasco Thall company, has written a play which he calls "The Prince Imperial" and which will probably be produced before the present season closes. The play, as its title indicates, is historical. It deals with the Second Empire, Napoleon III and the people of that period. The Prince Imperial is the hero, Napoleon Eugene Louis Bonaparte, the fruit of the marriage of Napoleon III, nephew of the first Emperor, and the Countess de Montijo of Spain. It will be remembered that, after the fall of the Empire, caused by the failure of the French war, the Bonapartes were proscribed, and spent a greater portion of several years at Cheslehurst, Kent, England. It was there the Emperor died in 1873. The Prince was sent to Woolwich college where he was commissioned an officer in the English army, and was later killed by the Kaffirs in Africa during that war. The plot of the play and its characters sound very promising, and there is no doubt that the play will please the public. It is not Mr. Emery's first effort as he has before this written plays. His fellow actors as well as his friends outside of the profession are looking forward to "The Prince Imperial's" successful production.

At Fischer's

The changes in the furnishings and the plan of Fischer's theatre have transformed it into one of the prettiest and most genial playhouses in the city. The public is proving that it likes good clean burlesque by the way it is patronizing "Christopher Jr." "The French Maid" was a little too British in its ground plan and dialogue to catch on briskly but the present bill has a less solid flavor. There is a French ballet in it and its plot is British but the new business introduced is strictly United States. There is much good music in it, and "Lazily, drowsily," "He couldn't tell a lie," "Love's highway," "The Sisters Giggle" and the rest are all very melodic. I thought "The Lady Slavey" the best of any of these musical comedies that have visited San Francisco. They are all much alike in their general make-up. It is the gags, the chorus, and the costumes that make this sort of thing so attractive. Pilar Morin does well with the name role but it is again Lillian Coleman who carries away the larger portion of the laurels. Hermsen is an amusing Irishman and the company as a whole fits well into its several roles. Winfield Blake has the best voice among the men and he is a clever actor as well.

White Whittlesey will again support Florence Roberts in her season at the Alcazar which opens in June. "Zaza," in which Miss Roberts has made a pronounced hit in the Northwest, will be her opening bill.

Attractions Next Week

Blanche Walsh closes at the Columbia tomorrow night, when she will play "Janice Meredith." "The Christian," with a far stronger cast than we saw here before, will be Monday night's bill. It will stay two weeks. Elsie Leslie as Glory Quayle and E. J. Morgan in his original role of John Storm head a strong company.

At the Grand Melbourne MacDowell and Florence Stone are repeating their triumph of last season. "Cleopatra" is again given one of the most sumptuous productions ever seen on any stage. Beginning Monday evening next "La Tosca," the greatest financial and artistic success the late Fanny Davenport had during her long connection with the stage, will be given. Mr. MacDowell and Miss Stone, as Scarpia and Floria, and a cast equal to the original in every particular are promised. That it will do a tremendous business there is no question.

Monday will mark the opening of the fifth week of "The Serenade" at the Tivoli, and there is no diminution in the demand for seats. The opera is a money winner. "The Fortune Teller" is to be the next production, another case of a high-priced opera at the popular tariff.

"Little Christopher" has decidedly caught on at Fischer's and is drawing large and enthusiastic audiences. It will be continued all next week. "The Ballet Girl" is in preparation.

Fanny Rice with her pretty act has made a hit at the Orpheum, a success shared by her accompanist, Alice Beach McComas. They will have a second edition of "Surprises" next week. Papinta, always a favorite here, will return with four of her most noted dances—the Boulevard, Danse du Diable, Volcano and Jardiniere—and with new music especially written up to her solos. Louis A. Simon, Grace Gardner & Co., will appear for the first time in this city in their comedy, "The New Coachman." Frank Lincoln, the "globe trotting humorist," has a melange of new songs, stories and musical sketches, and a burlesque of Italian opera. The Melani trio of vocalists and instrumentalists promise a musical sensation. George Gorman, minstrel and singing comedian, and Frances Keppler, dancer, will present "Crippens Corners." Hedrix and Prescott, the singing and dancing duo, and Les Troubadours Toulousians, will appear for the last times. Among new moving pictures the Biograph will show a panorama of the San Francisco water front.

One of the funniest comedy scenes ever devised is the introduction of a phonograph as one of the principal characters, which is done in "On and Off," this week's bill at the Alcazar. "On and Off" is certainly a big drawing card, and its second week beginning Monday night will be even more popular than its first. "Brother John," "Madame Butterfly," and "Why Smith Left Home" are future attractions. "When the Heart Was Young," by Charles Francis Bryant and Lotta Day Coleman, will soon be produced.

"Man o' War's Man," a great naval drama, is to be presented at the Central next week, for the first time in this city.

LETTERS

Unfit for Publication

Hall Caine's difficulty with the Pearsons over the publication serially of "The Eternal City" has been settled out of court. Clement Shorter, editor of The Sphere, acted as arbitrator or peacemaker, and Caine has accepted payment for only such portion of the novel as was published in Pearson's before the editor discovered its unfitness for his clientele. The dispute is not the only one of the kind, though it seems to have absorbed the public attention. The Frederick A. Stokes company has a similar suit on its hands in connection with the recent novel of Agnes and Edgerton Castle, "The Secret Orchard," and as this suit will come into court first, the decision will probably determine the outcome of the English dispute. The Stokes company owned both the book and the serial rights in this country, and sold the latter to the Delineator. At the time the story was not yet completed, and no one in America had read any part of it, but a synopsis had been submitted, and the previous works of these authors had been such as to make it a seeming certainty that they would be the least likely to shock "the young person." When the manuscript arrived the contract was repudiated by the Delineator on the ground that the novel was immoral. In this connection it is worth while noting that the Cosmopolitan, which ceased the publication of Tolstoi's "Resurrection," accepted "The Secret Orchard." Another suit of the same kind may arise between the Sunny South and the executors of the late Sir Walter Besant. The Sunny South has been using " No Other Way" as a serial, but as it developed in the fourth installment that the heroine was to marry a negro, the publication has abruptly ceased, with some scathing remarks on the subject of indecency.

Melodrama in Book Form

Scene, a New England fishing village; characters, Hester and Ethel Blair, daughters of a deceased squire who has given them every advantage which his wealth could secure, but whose estate, when he dies, is found to consists of nothing but his farmhouse; Millie, housekeeper for the young ladies, who are keeping summer boarders as a means of livelihood; "Slack" Dorkins, a fisherman and household retainer of the Blairs, comedy lover of Millie, whom he has courted unsuccessfully for twenty years; John Cary, playmate and lifelong adorer of Hester, who is supplanted in her affections by Ralph Featherly, one of the summer boarders, adopted son of a wealthy New York banker, but rich in his own right; Glen Hopedale Fenton, heavy villain, bent on ruining Hester, and with money enough to carry out his plan if that is all that is needed; fishermen, boatmen, religious gossips, and summer boarders. Featherly, under promise to his father, whose own second venture has proved disastrous, never to marry. Hester, enlightened by Aunt Carry, persuaded that marriage would be a dangerous venture, or at all events the disclosure would be injudicious. Secret ceremony, lost certificate, death of clergyman, destruction of records and disappearance of witnesses. Hester installed in a luxurious apartment in New York, ostensibly as a music teacher. Fenton more than sucpicious that all is not as it appears. Sudden death of Featherly. No proof of marriage. Abandonment of flat and installment in humbler quarters. Persecution by Fenton and defence by Cary. Return to childhood's home, sniffs and sneers of villagers, humble resignation of virtuous heroine, and complete vindication, with all characters in the last scene. Discomfiture of the villain and happy marriage with early lover. That is "Hester Blair," an old-time melodrama, from which there are missing only the father's curse and the precious che-ild to bring about the happy denouement. Indeed, the child is not altogether wanting, but she is only one of the villagers, who finds and restores the missing marriage certificate and makes remarks that older folk are wise enough to suppress. One cannot help feeling that the author, William Henry Carson, has written with an eye to dramatic production, and any average amateur company ought to be able to produce it without going to more trouble than copying each his own share of the dialogue. The book is a characteristic example of its kind. The villagers are natural, with their prejudices and oddities, and the clumsy jokes and horseplay of the boatmen are such as we are long since familiar with. The plot unfolds naturally and without artificial hindrances and obstacles. One is not hampered with the niceties of hair-splitting or doubts about the moral or social standing of the characters, for they are neatly labeled on their first appearance. Neither the villain nor any one of the "nature's noblemen" has a single redeeming quality. The villain even smokes cigarettes. In fact, there is to be found in this book all the charms which come from reminiscence and familiarity, and it is better written than the majority of novels of the same grade. It is even refreshing as a variation from the strenuous life and problem novels which have predominated. As a piece of bookmaking it is a credit to the publishers, the C. M. Clark Company of Boston.

Verne as a Prophet

Some one has again been pointing out the surprising number of instances in which Jules Verne's fanciful tales have been prophetic. His "Five Weeks in a Balloon" is now regarded as not only possible, but very likely to be proved practicable, since two French scientists are ready to undertake a journey in a balloon across the Dark Continent. The Holland submarine boat was foreshadowed in the Nautilius of "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," and the modern long range cannon and aerial torpedoes come near to "The Five Hundred Millions of the Begum." "Dr. Ox's Experiment" is an established fact and "Around the World in Eighty Days" is slow travel without extraordinary effort in these days. Pittsburg comes fairly within the description of the "City of Steel." The voyage of the Belgica comes near to being Verne's "Sea of Ice," and in several of his other works he has made successful forecasts. If the political prophet could establish his capacity in anything approximating the success of the French romancer he would not be seeking obscurity immediately after "the first Tuesday following the first Monday, etc."

Talbot Stock Farm for Sale

A splendid opportunity is offered to any one desiring to invest in a handsome country place, in the sale of the Talbot Stock Farm. This is the property of F. C. Talbot, situated near San Leandro and adjoining the Souther farm, now known as the Dunsmuir Place. The Talbot place contains one hundred and forty acres under the highest state of cultivation. Sixty acres are planted in fruit—all varieties of almonds, walnuts, olives, oranges, lemons, prunes, cherries, pears, apples, quinces, crab-apples, figs, grapes, apricots, etc.; two thousand walnut trees are in full bearing. Eighty acres of choice farming land are sown in red oats for hay; one-fourth of the crop goes with the ranch baled and delivered in barns. There are green houses and gardens, dairy, dwelling house and servants' quarters, children's playhouse, storehouse and other outbuildings. The residence is a beautiful modern house of twelve rooms, with four baths, running water and gas throughout, plumbing and gas fixtures, the finest obtainable. The Talbot farm is finely situated at the base of the foothills and is one of the show places of San Leandro.

The Loring Club Concert

The Loring club concert last week was on the same night as Mrs. Fisk's first recital but, as is ever the case at invitational affairs, the hall was crowded. One of the best numbers was Arthur Foote's "Farewell of Hiawatha," which was repeated in response to the demand. Harry Barnhart, who sang the solo, was in splendid voice and made a great success. Miss Grace Davis was the soloist for "The Awakening of the Spring," which was another fine number. Miss Davis, always a pleasing singer, has improved greatly during the past year, and her voice shows great possibilities for the future. Her fresh, sweet tones rang out clear and strong over all the male voices. She also sang three solos, one of which, "Oh, Swallow, Swallow, Flying South," is remembered as a favorite selection of Anna Miller Wood, the San Francisco contralto who has made such a name for herself in Boston and London. "King Waldemar's Chase," by De Koven, was a rousing chorus and was sung with much spirit by the club. The club still shows a lack of tenors and until this want is supplied will always lack proper balance. It is a pity some of the bassos cannot be metamorphosed into tenors.

The concert at the opening of the spring exhibition at the Hopkins' Institute, last week, was rendered by an orchestra under Henry Heyman's direction, selections from Bach, Funke, Strauss, Sousa, Arditi, Vollstedt and others being given. Mr. Mahood was the soloist, rendering selections for cornet. There was another concert on Thursday evening of this week. During this exhibition vocal and instrumental concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, March twenty-seventh, and April third and tenth.

The San Francisco Oratorio Society has been reorganized, with Mr. W. A. Knowles as president. The reorganization of the society is due in a measure to a communication received from S. H. Freidlander, who desires the co-operation of a thoroughly organized choral society for the purpose of presenting with choral setting many of the singers of national reputation whom he expects to bring to this city in the near future.

Madame Mantelli, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera House company, has just returned from a South American tour, where she met with most gratifying success. She has arranged for a series of concerts which will include the Pacific coast, and on her tour will be supported by Louis Blumenberg, the 'cellist, and a pianist.

There will be special services at Trinity church during Holy Week. On the evening of March twenty-sixth, at eight o'clock, Stainer's "Crucifixion" will be sung. The Easter service will be very elaborate, and in addition to the organ accompaniment there will be two trumpets, three trombones and tympani.

Music—Continued

A Conservatory Recital

A very large audience enjoyed the recital at the California Conservatory of Music of which Otto Bendix is director, last Friday evening. The program was of a high order and was worthy of a larger auditorium. The vocal and instrumental numbers were equally excellent, and displayed a fine technique and finish. Especially good was the final number, the two movements of Grieg's sonate for violin and piano by Nathan Landsberger and Miss Mayer. The other numbers were: Mozart, violin and piano sonate in E, Mrs. Landsberger and Mrs. Leon; Schubert, Ave Maria, Miss O'Donnell; Raff, violin sonate, The Chromatic, Mrs. Sears, Mr. Landsberger; Gade, sonate for violin and piano, first movement, Miss Peterson Mr. Landsberger; Rachaminoff, romanza from Suite No. 2, first time in America, Mrs. Aylwin, Miss Hausen; Raff, Andante for piano and violin, Miss Hansen, Mr. Landsberger; Chopin, Polonaise, Miss Reinstein; Bemberg, Hindoo Song, and Song by d'Hardelot, Mrs. Daniells

They are having "Pop" concerts at the Bohemian club. Lunch is served in the jinks room where Stark and his orchestra play. The "Pops" will continue on Saturdays during March. But they are for members only and outsiders can have no chance of enjoying them.

A very large audience enjoyed the Pasmore concert on Tuesday evening. The program was admirably arranged and the selections all of the highest order. The favor with which Mr. Pasmore's series of concerts has been received shows that the public can appreciate concerts by local talent, and patronize them, too, when sure of their being good. The soloists were Miss George, Miss Birchler, Mrs. Basford, Mr. Pasmore and the three Pasmore sisters.

The recital by pupils of the dramatic department of the Von Meyerinck school, on Monday evening, was successful from every point of view, reflecting great credit on the school, its teachers and pupils.

Katherine Fisk's Thursday afternoon recital did not draw a large audience, but on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon there were very good houses. At every recital the singer gained in favor. —The Music Critic

A Foregone Conclusion

The pretty palmist held his palm;
He felt vibrations up his arm;
"You'll win your way," she said;
"No dangers need your soul alarm;
You're brave and bold, a potent charm"—
With blushes he grew red.

"You'll marry soon and not for dough,
But love on both sides, don't you know"—
Around her waist, his arm—
She could not read another line.
"'Tis you I love," he said. "Be mine"—
In his hand went her palm.

The Gentleman

Eevrybody is talking about What Makes a Gentleman, since Mrs. Astor made her much-quoted assertion about only college bred men eligible to that distinction. This is what Martin Maartens, the novelist, has to say about Gentlemen in "The Greater Glory":
